

937.73

M131

Columbia University in the City of New York

LIBRARY

HISTORY OF THE
AMERICAN EPISCOPAL CHURCH

HISTORY
OF THE
American Episcopal Church

BY
S. D. McCONNELL, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D.

TENTH EDITION

REVISED AND ENLARGED
AND CONTINUED TO THE YEAR 1915

MILWAUKEE
THE YOUNG CHURCHMAN CO.

LONDON
A. R. MOWBRAY & CO.
1916

COPYRIGHT, 1890, BY THOMAS WHITTAKER
COPYRIGHT, 1897, BY THOMAS WHITTAKER
COPYRIGHT, 1916, BY THE YOUNG CHURCHMAN CO.

537.13

1913

TO MY BOYS
ELLCOTT, GUTHRIE, CHRYSTIE

“Superficial it must be, but I do not disown the charge. Better a superficial book which brings well and strikingly together the known and acknowledged facts, than a dull, boring narrative, pausing at every moment to see farther into a millstone than the nature of the millstone will admit.”

—SIR WALTER SCOTT, Journal, Dec. 22, 1825.

PREFACE TO TENTH EDITION

IN PREPARING this sketch of the American Church originally, I stopped at the settlement of the Civil War. Of course this was an arbitrary stopping place. The war was not an ecclesiastical epoch, and its settlement concluded no Church movement. But its date coincided with the entrance upon the stage of the Churchmen living at the date of the writing. I shrank from the frank expression concerning contemporary men and events which I had ventured upon with those the record of whose influence had been made up.

Moreover, the most difficult history to write is contemporaneous history. One cannot tell surely what events are important and what trivial. Time, and time alone, sorts them out and assigns to each its proper significance.

I have now attempted to sketch briefly the Church's movement down to the present time. No doubt I have left unnoticed men and things which another would have dwelt upon, and have laid emphasis upon events which another would have disregarded. All that I can say is that this is the way that the history appears to me. If it appears otherwise to another he has the right to record it in his fashion.

Easter, 1916.

S. D. McCONNELL.

CONTENTS.

PART FIRST.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH IN THE COLONIES.

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. THE STAGE	5
The Indians; ownership of the soil; occasion of the immigration; the Spanish Peace; the Act of Uniformity; its effect to destroy the national quality of the Church.
II. THE VIRGINIANS	14
Raleigh's Colony; Gorges' Colony; the Virginia Company; the first Church; English interest in Colonial ventures; Indian Missions; Pocahontas; first representative Assembly; laws concerning Religion; spirit of the laws; relaxation of manners.
III. THE PURITANS	26
Religious parties in England; not unequal division; the Churchmen's theory; the "Pilgrims"; the Salem Colony; Puritan theory and practice; the Puritan temper; the Puritan laws; planting the Church; John Morton; the Brown brothers; the Rev. William Blaxton; Churchmen in Massachusetts; withdrawal of the Charter; the Church and the Government; parish organized in Boston; Governor Andros; the Old South; King's Chapel; the quarrel ended.
IV. THE ROMAN CATHOLICS	48
Lord Baltimore; the Maryland Colony; Romanists and religious liberty; persecution by them impossible; slow growth of the colony; "bad Catholics"; revocation of the Charter; unworthy Clergy; the situation in 1770.
V. THE DUTCH	59
Seeking the East Indies; ecclesiastical position of the Dutch; the Dutch as settlers; religious toleration; coming of the English; Church establishment; plan for the Episcopate; Trinity Church.

CHAPTER	PAGE
VI. THE SOUTH RIVER	69
The Swedes; their absorption by the English; George Fox; Quakerism; extravagance and repression; persecution; Quakers in New Jersey; William Penn; Penn's Colony; Quakers coming to the Church; George Keith; first Pennsylvania Church; increase and spread.
VII. THE CAROLINAS	82
Indians and Welsh; the "noble" Colony; religious condition; Church establishment.
VIII. A GENERAL SURVEY	85
The year 1700; Services; use of the Prayer Book; social status of the Clergy; Clerical manners; effect of Puritanism upon the Ministerial office; conflict with the Vestries; effect of government support; the Church in New England; in the Middle Colonies.
IX. THE "VENERABLE SOCIETY"	96
Dr. Bray; his report upon the Church in the Colonies; the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; instructions to Missionaries; Keith and Talbot; conciliating Dissenters; building churches; work of the Missionaries.
X. THE COMMISSARIES: MARYLAND	105
Dr. Bray; the Maryland establishment; attempt to reform manners; the Clergy vs. the people; hostile legislation; growth of other churches.
XI. THE COMMISSARIES: VIRGINIA	112
William and Mary College; opposition to the College; the College and the Church; decline of discipline; attempt at reform; devoted men in the Church; growing spirit of Americanism; the "Parsons' Cause"; Patrick Henry; the results.
XII. THE NEW ENGLAND CONVERTS	127
President Cutler; the question of Orders; the attraction of the Church; President and Professors of Yale enter the Church; Puritan opposition; accessions; Dean Berkeley.
XIII. THE "GREAT AWAKENING"	136
Jonathan Edwards; the "Revival" at Northampton; Edwards's theory of "conversion"; "bodily exercises"; spread of the movement; the "jerks"; meets Whitefield; attitude of Churchmen; the reaction; effect upon American religion; the Church's position; how affected by the movement.

CHAPTER	PAGE
XIV. THE GERMANS	147
First German immigration; the "Pennsylvania Dutch"; religious character and condition; the Moravians; their influence on Whitefield; intractable material for the Church.
XV. THE SCOTCH-IRISH	153
England and Scotland at the Reformation; Calvinism and Presbyterianism; Presbytery and Episcopacy; Episcopal rigor; emigration to Ireland; emigration to the United States; hostility to the Church; a cordon around her; influence upon the Church.
XVI. THE METHODISTS	160
The first American sect; its origin; Methodists the first "Ritualists"; the Wesleys in Georgia; Wesley as a parish priest; Wesley and the Moravians; Wesley's "conversion"; desperate state of Religion in England; the Methodist purpose; Whitefield the preacher and Wesley the organizer; Methodism comes to America; still within the Church; the Methodist "Bishops"; the loss by separation.
XVII. THE EPISCOPATE	173
Two theories of the Church; disadvantage of the Church's theory in the Colonies; Ordination and Discipline; early efforts for the Episcopate; the need of it patent; great opportunities lost; the "S. P. G.'s" plan; the Pennsylvania plan; reasons of the failure; current conception of the Episcopal office; Colonial opposition; early thought of separation; legal status of the Colonies; opposition not unreasonable; John Adams's opinion; not possible till after the Revolution; idea of an "Independent Episcopal Church"; Dr. White's plan; the popular judgment.
XVIII. A SURVEY	190
Spread of the Church in Connecticut; in New York; in New Jersey and Pennsylvania; in the South; Indian Missions; sources of gain; lack of Clergy; state of Religion; influence of Franklin; coarseness of the age; social distinctions; Services; Architecture; Confirmation; Clerical support.
XIX. THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE	202
The inevitable conflict; equal division of parties; exodus of Tories; lay Churchmen's position; position of the Clergy; "patriot" Clergy; "loyalist" Clergy; sufferings of the Clergy; desolation of the Church.

PART SECOND.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. GATHERING UP THE FRAGMENTS	215
The confusion; treatment of the Tories; popular opinion about the Church; three motives in reorganization; the Southern attempt; the Church named; organization in Maryland and Virginia; relation of Church and State settled.
II. THE NEW ENGLAND PLAN	223
New England Churchmanship; distrust of loose views; first Connecticut Convention; political obstacles; choosing a Bishop; the programme; the sentiment in England; English Bishops' reluctance; the Scotch and New England Churches; the Nonjurors; the first Bishop.
III. THE FEDERAL IDEA	238
Colonial school of statesmanship; Rev. Dr. White; the Conference at New Brunswick; fundamental principles; Constitutional Convention; two proposed policies; State and Church Constitutions; laymen in Church Councils; revising the Prayer Book; the "Proposed Book"; Fourth of July Service; anti-dogmatic spirit; Unitarianism; the Episcopate: Address to the English Bishops; the Bishops' reply; Bishops chosen.
IV. THE TWO EPISCOPACIES	254
Two Episcopal Churches: obstacles to union; plans to perpetuate the separation; striving for union; Dr. Parker's scheme; Convention of 1789; Bishop White and the English succession; adjusting difficulties; Bishop Seabury's Toryism; adopting a Liturgy; modifying the Constitution; consolidation.
V. STRUCTURAL DEVELOPMENT	264
The experiment revolutionary; government by Convention; relation of the three orders; powers of a Bishop; right of Visitation; encroachment of Standing Committee; powers of the House of Bishops increased; discipline of the Laity; control of the Liturgy; Uniformity; Hymns; power of General Convention; State autonomy; its gradual abandonment; The Thirty-nine Articles; their origin; their obligation.

CHAPTER	PAGE
VI. FROM THE OLD TO THE NEW	277
Old men and new times; a dark epoch; French infidelity; position of the Church; Confirmation; slack administration; troubles in New York; election of Hobart; the question of wigs; condition in the South; low estate in Virginia; Meade ordained; situation in New England; Bishop Seabury's manner; Dr. Coke's proposition; Methodists gone beyond recall; dawning of better days; new men at work; representative men; beginning of Sunday-schools; state of the Church in 1820.
VII. WAITING FOR VOLUNTEERS	297
The national Church passive; pioneer Churchmen; religion in the backwoods; first thought of Missions; two streams of emigration; Bishop Chase; in New Orleans; pioneer missionary in Ohio; the frontier Bishop; Kenyon College; the Church in Kentucky; Bishop Otey; the Church in Tennessee; new departure in 1835.
VIII. NEW SPIRITUAL FORCES	311
Meagre spiritual life; the Evangelicals; their differentiate; conscious experiences; Simeon's Confessions; their conception of the Church; Low Churchmen; their achievements; cause of their decline; Thomas Scott; their leaders in America; High Church revival; the two parties; division of labor; advance of Churchmanship; following the emigration; two Ideals.
IX. THE CATHOLIC RENAISSANCE	324
Emergence of Church Idea; trial of Bishops; agencies at work; increasing activity; change of manners; corporate religion; the "Oxford Movement"; the "Tractarians"; the Via Media; Newman's purpose; the Via Media in America; American Churchmen; Anglo-Catholics; a time of strife; perverts and converts; good and evil of the Movement.
X. A PLACE WHERE TWO WAYS MEET	342
Falling behind the population; a Church or a Sect; the Memorial; emancipation of the Episcopate; loosening of Rubrics; revival of the Diaconate; Church Unity; divers opinions; a true bill found; a fatal choice; spirit of General Convention; progress in a narrow path; the Church in California; the Church in Oregon; muttering of coming war.

CHAPTER	PAGE
XI. IN WAR TIME	360
Division of Churches upon the question of Slavery; political division furthered thereby; Episcopal Church not divided; general sentiment in the Church; the Church faulted; mutual understanding; Southern Bishops oppose secession; Southern idea of the Church and the States; Secession; the Church and the Union: the Church in the Confederacy; conflict with Federal authorities; General Butler as a Canonist; fall of the Confederate Church.
XII. THE REUNITED CHURCH	374
Moving toward union; obstacles in the way; Arkansas; Bishop Wilmer; Bishop Polk; General Convention of 1865; reunion imperilled; Mr. Horace Binney's resolution; Dr. Kerfoot's plea; reunion; disbandment of the Confederate Church; religious effects of the war; new forces and new problems; task of the present generation.
XIII. DOCTRINE AND CEREMONIAL	382
The worth of ritual; the Church idea; civic ritual; the ritualists' contention; Bishop Hopkins's book; the Bishops' Declaration; the Ritual Commission; things forbidden; Dr. De Koven's challenge; the Church's comprehensiveness; the end of controversy.
XIV. PEACE WITH HONOR	395
Evangelical perplexity; Bishops' declaration on regeneration; the idea of secession; "Reformed Episcopalians."
XV. PRAYER-BOOK REVISION	402
"The Prayer-Book as it is;" separation of offices; the science of liturgies; revision begun; the Book Annexed.
XVI. THE CHURCH SEEKING FELLOWSHIP	410
Looking to the East; Italian reform; Mexico; contradictory reports from Mexico; Mexican commission appointed; consecration of Bishop Riley; the Church unity movement; the Quadrilateral.
XVII. THE RECENT PAST	428
Commission on Faith and Order; Church Work; Age of Corporate Action; The Modern Priest; Free Church System; The New Social Conscience; Marriage and Divorce; Rights of the Laity; The Church and the Negro; Change of Name; Provincial System; Proportionate Representation.
XVIII. THE NET RESULT	444

ILLUSTRATIONS

	FACING PAGE
CAPTAIN JOHN SMITH	9
FRIEZE. ROBERT HUNT AND THE JAMESTOWN COLONY	17
POHICK CHURCH, VIRGINIA	119
GOOSE CREEK CHURCH, SOUTH CAROLINA	125
BENJAMIN FRANKLIN	196
SAMUEL SEABURY, FIRST BISHOP OF CONNECTICUT	227
WILLIAM WHITE, FIRST BISHOP OF PENNSYLVANIA	236
EDWARD BASS, FIRST BISHOP OF MASSACHUSETTS	259
PHILANDER CHASE, FIRST BISHOP OF OHIO AND AFTERWARD OF ILLINOIS	293
WILLIAM AUGUSTUS MUILLENBERG	343
JOHN HENRY HOPKINS, FIRST BISHOP OF VERMONT	387
JAMES DE KOVEN	392
MORGAN DIX	394
NASHOTAH—IN EARLY DAYS	440
THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL	440

INTRODUCTION.

FOR many years I had it in my mind to attempt a History of American Christianity. It has been frequently noticed that the Christianity of America possesses characteristics of its own. It is not only different in many regards from that which subsisted in Europe at the time of the settlement of the colonies; but it is different from that which subsists in any other portion of Christendom now. Christianity here wears a garment of American weaving and American adornment. The religious history of the country is quite as striking as its political; it has had as many and as marked epochs; the influences which have shaped it have to be sought for in more numerous and more diverse sources; and those influences are more actively at work now than are those which produce political changes.

With this fact in view I thought to trace the stream of religious life in the United States to its many and various sources, to estimate the relative size and importance of the affluents which have colored it, and maybe to forecast its future course.

I found the project to be so difficult that I abandoned it. Contemporary history is the least valuable of all kinds. The relative importance of events and persons cannot be fairly estimated till time has tested them and shown which is great and which is small. The coherence of the facts in the religious history of our land cannot yet be seen. The facts themselves are abundant to embarrassment; but they cannot yet be strung upon any single thread which I have been able to discover. In the political history of the country the unifying fact is the gradual coalescence of a number of independent and rival political organizations into one great whole, bound together by their common interest in a constitutionally regulated liberty.

But alas! the ecclesiastical history of the United States has lagged a whole century behind its political. Free and independent churches are coincident in date with free and independent colonies. In the State the movement toward unity set in a hundred years ago; in the Church it is only beginning to show itself. The Church has been content for most of this time with Mexican anarchy. It had been excused or justified by precisely the same arguments which were used in the colonies against the adoption of the federal Constitution: "Liberty is best secured by allowing each to work in its own way; the danger of attack from without is so remote and unlikely that it need not be considered; the original charters of each are inalienable; the weak ones will be swallowed up by the strong; mutual jealousies and ancient grudges are too strong and deep-rooted to be overcome; no principle of federation can be proposed which can ever be adopted; the different colonies can best dwell together as brethren by not coming into too close relations."

While this condition of things remains there cannot be written a history of the American Church. That will not be possible until there shall be an American Church. That time will surely come, — when, no man may say.

I have undertaken therefore the more modest task to set out the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. Its life is continuous from the beginning. It was first on the ground. It is of interest to all Churchmen, and, for reasons which I hope to make evident, ought to be to all Americans. I shall speak of it habitually as "the Church" — not as arrogating for it an exclusive right to that title, but because its legal name is uncouth and clumsy. I shall try to tell the story of what it has accomplished, and to speak candidly of its excellences and its faults. A history should above all things else be true. Glozing of faults and apologizing for wrong deeds is not the part of an honest friend or of an honest man. The Church can afford to have the truth told even about herself. He who finds it in his way to do this may not be accused of uncovering his mother's nakedness.

But in the telling of the story large space will be occupied in examining the religious character and habits of those among and upon whom the Church has wrought. She has done great things for them, whereof they are not ashamed to say they are glad, but they have also done much for her. The Episcopal Church has been far more profoundly modified by her environment here than her members realize. Some of her most cherished possessions have come to her from without. In many cases she has never known, or has long since forgotten, the name of the giver, but still holds and values the gift. It will be our task to notice the reciprocal influence of this Church upon the communities where she has lived, and of those peoples upon her. We will see that she has thriven among Puritans and Quakers, Baptists and Presbyterians, Dutch, Germans, and Irish; has taught them all something, and learned something from them all.

PART I.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE COLONIES

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

PART I.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE COLONIES.

CHAPTER I.

THE STAGE.

WE will take for the starting-point the year 1600. We will notice in their order the Stage, the Actors, and the Drama.

The stage upon which the action begins is the Atlantic seaboard, from the Kennebec on the north to the Savannah on the south, and extending backward roughly to the Mississippi. To the north and northwest the French are in possession. Seventy years before this time Cartier had sailed up the St. Lawrence, and anchored his shallop off the Heights of Abraham. Champlain and his little band of hardy adventurers are "seeking the skins of beasts and the souls of men" on the banks of the great lakes. That picturesque movement of French exploration and Jesuit missionary zeal had already set in which carried Marquette to the Illinois, Hennepin to the Falls of St. Anthony, and La Salle to the Brazos. Unfortunate Acadie was in its infancy.

Le Caron, the Franciscan monk, and the Jesuits Jogues, Brebœuf, and Garnier were getting ready for that career which was to end in martyrdom among the Hurons and Iroquois.

On the south and southwest the Spaniards held the soil. Forts and churches were on the St. John's and the Gulf, and a bishop with his priests on the Rio Grande.

But from Maine to Georgia no white man dwelt. It was a virgin field upon which to work out the problems in religion, politics, and social life, which were perplexing England. The country was not without inhabitants. It was held by the only race of savages who have ever been able to make a stand against the advancing army of civilization. These withstood it, fought it off, broke themselves against it, dammed it back in one locality, only to find it flowing in behind them in another, until they perished in their tracks, or became encysted within set limits among the new people. How many Indians there were three centuries ago, it is not possible now to know. The consensus of scientific guesswork sets the number at about one million, within the present territory of the United States. They were divided roughly into three great groups or clusters.

(1) The Algonkins, who have left their crabbed polysyllables in the names of New England lakes and rivers. (2) A subdivision of the same great family, of a more euphonious speech and a fiercer savagery, whose seat was between the Hudson and the Susquehanna, and stretching westward indefinitely to and beyond the Mississippi. (3) The Appalachians, dwelling south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi. In their manners they ranged from absolute savagery in the north to semi-barbarism in the south.¹ The conversion of these people to Christianity was the first, or, at any rate, the first-named motive for the coming of all the colonies. We shall have to notice again and again the efforts made to carry out this purpose. We will find it to be a record of failures. We will discover also a strange uniformity of feature in the successive failures. In every case the intelligence, apparent self-restraint, dignity, and gravity of the Indian led the missionaries to forecast great successes. The first essay always seemed to justify great hopes. The Indian listened, argued, seemed to be concerned, gave his children to be taught, and led the missionary to report the probable conversion of his whole tribe. But always, just when the project seemed most hopeful, an indiscriminate massacre of missionaries and converts together swept the enterprise out of existence. The experience of all was the same.² Jesuit, Churchman, Puritan, Moravian, and Presbyterian missions all had the same issue. Their light was put out in blood on the Mohawk, the James, the Connecticut, and the Wabash. The "great massacre" is the last chapter in the history of the Indian mission in early days. They were irreclaimable as panthers. With intellectual endowment far beyond that of any other savage race, they were marked by the two qualities of treachery and cruelty to an indescribable degree. To love his enemy and to speak the truth seems to have been to the Indian cougenitally impossible. In any case, this was true until they became reduced to helplessness two centuries and a half later, by being surrounded and disarmed. This fierce and hateful people roamed over the land in which a Christian church and nation was to grow. They had no ownership in it, in the way we understand the term. The tribes lived far apart. Each had for its own hunting-grounds the territory from which it was not barred by its rivals. Each looked with jealousy upon all interlopers, but each was prompt to act as an interloper when occasion offered. Every good hunting-ground was claimed by many tribes. It was rare indeed that any tribe had an uncontested title to a tract of land, and where such a title did exist it rested, not on an actual occupancy and cultivation, but on the recent butchery of weaker rivals.¹ It is within the truth to say that the only title of any value either in law or morals which Indians have ever possessed is that given them by the people whom they fought for centuries, to the Reservations where the remnant of them now live.

¹ Parkman: Discovery of the Great West, p. 275.

² Ibid., p. 26.

From whence will come settlers hardy enough to occupy this richly furnished, but savage and perilous stage? To answer this we must cross the ocean and see the colonists in their old homes.

Within ten years of 1600 two events occurred in England which set in motion the emigration to America.

They were: (1) The treaty of peace with Spain.² (2) The revived enforcement of the Acts of "Uniformity" and "Supremacy."

The way they operated was as follows:—

¹ Roosevelt: Winning of the West, vol. i. p. 88.

² The Peace was concluded Aug. 18, 1604.

CAPTAIN JOHN SMITH

For three generations England had been at war by sea and by land. The need of the belligerent times had created a class of men whose trade was warfare. "Sea dogs," like Frobisher, Drake, Hawkins, and Hudson with their hardy crews, holding letters of marque from the Protestant Princes of Europe, or commissions from the Crown, had learned sailing and fighting as a craft. Soldiers of fortune like Raleigh, Smith, and Standish had carried their swords to market in every Protestant State in Europe. Each captain with his ship and crew, each swash-buckler with his band of musketeers at his heels, made his own bargain, or hired out his ship and guns to serve in any quarrel which his somewhat tough conscience would allow him to espouse. They were soldiers by profession and training, one might almost say by birth. They had swept around the British Isles chasing the Armada, and had fought against the Spaniard in the Low Countries, and against the Turk on the plains of Hungary. Now, the unwonted experience of a peace with their hereditary foe left them without employment. With their crews and their companies they were thrown upon the world to earn a livelihood. There was no place for them in England. The England of 1600 was not the mighty empire of industry and commerce that it is to-day. London was a town smaller in size and with less than half the wealth of Denver or Hartford. Bristol and Plymouth, the places next in importance, were such as Norwich, Conn., or Norfolk, Va., are to-day. There was but little commerce; manufactures were of the rudest, and agriculture the most primitive. Wolves were still dangerous within a day's ride on horseback of London. Swamps and fens held the places where cities now stand. Wild cattle were still found in the north. The farmer lived in a wattled and clay-covered house. The country was too small and too poor to absorb and provide for the multitude of soldiers and sailors out of occupation through the unwonted peace. The sea-dog therefore became an explorer, and the soldier of fortune was ready to guard the peaceful colonist.

The revival of the "Act of Uniformity" at the same juncture made England an uncomfortable place for nearly one-half of her population. The Act of Uniformity. Act provided that every congregation of Christian people, in its public worship, must use the Book of Common Prayer according to its rubrics. The Prayer-Book was distasteful to a large proportion of the people, for various reasons. A few opposed it on principle as being Romish. To their minds the Reformation in England had stopped midway to completion. They thought they saw in the authorities, civil and ecclesiastic, a disposition to bring in again the evils of papal times. They had for their ideal the church in Geneva and Frankfort as fashioned by Calvin and Farel. The Prayer-Book imposed upon them by law — a law enforced by fire, stocks, jail, and banishment — seemed to them to be in its very words and structure a league with death and a covenant with hell. Their objection was not only an abstract one against the attempt to enforce uniformity in worship, but also against the Prayer-Book which was imposed. They believed its doctrine to be dangerous to souls. This class was not large, but was active, learned, and filled with a sullen determination. But there was a far larger class who were led by prejudice and by customary usage to the same stand. The Act seemed to them to be, as indeed it was, a taking away of the hereditary right of Englishmen.¹ Uniformity of worship had never been known in England. A variety of uses, as York, Sarum, Bangor, and Hereford, had prevailed unquestioned up to within less than half a century of this time. In the early part of Elizabeth's reign there had been little change in the manner of public worship, of the sort which would strike the eye of the common worshipper. But for nearly a generation great confusion had existed. In some parishes the service was not distinguishable from the Roman mass, and in others from a Presbyterian meeting. In one parish the Holy Table was set up against the east wall altarwise, and in another set out "like an oyster board" in the aisle. In one parish a celibate priest officiated in cope and chasuble, while in the next a married priest held forth in his coat, while his wife wore the embroidered vestments for a petticoat. This state of things became intolerable to the authorities of the Church. They essayed to cure it by violence, and failed. But they did more than fail. By the attempt they destroyed the Church of England as a National Church. For a thousand years before that time the Church and the Nation had been one. From that time forward the Church of England ceased to be the Church of the English-speaking people. The confusion

Effect to break up the National Church.

¹ Anderson : History of the English Church in the Colonies, vol. i. p. 99.

which was attempted to be cured by the Act of Uniformity was a grave evil. No man could then see to what greater evils it might grow. The attempt to secure order by force commended itself to wise and good men. It is not necessary to accuse the Church's officers of conscious tyranny. They used what seemed to them the simplest and most efficacious method at hand. Time has shown their fearful blunder. They meant to act as statesmen; they acted as doctrinaires. The confusion of the time was but the restless exuberance of the incoming spiritual life to a half-dead Church. In time its excesses would have righted themselves. The attempt to secure uniformity in worship has only been successful, even within the Church, at those times when its life has been at the lowest. Every outburst of religious vigor has either strained the uniformity or broken a fragment from the Church. The Puritan, the Presbyterian, the Quaker, and the Methodist have each in their turn been lost to the Church which is their home, by making the house too strait for them. After two hundred and eighty years the assembled Bishops of the whole Pan-Anglican Communion have recorded their judgment that uniformity in discipline and worship is not only not to be compelled, but not to be expected. They declare with a unanimous voice, that with consensus upon the Creed, the Scriptures, the Sacraments administered in our Lord's own words, and the historical Episcopate, the people are to be left to the guidance of the Spirit which Christ has promised to His Church. The lesson has taken long to learn, and the teaching has been most costly. It cost the Church of England first the good-will, and then the presence, of those who carried away from her enough of devotion and vigor to found a new Nation and alien Churches.

Here, then, in 1600, were all the elements waiting from which to create a new world. A fertile continent waiting to be settled; a righteous and virile people, ill at ease at home, for colonists; adventurous captains with their ships and crews ready to transport them; professional soldiers ready at hand to garrison the new colonies, and fight against their savage foes. The flood of immigration approached America like the coming in of the tide. Its first waves touched only the nearest shore, and receded. Many unrecorded bands of adventurers visited, and quickly left the coast, from Newfoundland to Georgia. The story of each is romantic, but not to the purpose here.¹

¹ Bancroft: History of the U. S., vol. i. passim:

CHAPTER II.

THE VIRGINIANS.

THE first organized attempt to found a colony was made in 1585. Sir Walter Raleigh gathered a company of one hundred and fifty people, largely composed of gentlemen of the sword, secured them an outfit and the means of transportation, which they used to find a land at Roanoke which they named "Virginia," for the maiden queen. They were not the stuff from which successful colonists are made. They were not set together in families. Only two women were in the colony. Of one of these, the daughter of the Governor, was born Virginia Dare, the first white child in America. Improvidence, brawling, ignorance of husbandry, and wanton quarrels with the natives, soon brought the ill-starred colony to want, destitution, and despair. Their governor, White, strove manfully to save them from the Indians and from themselves, but in vain. They sat down starving upon the shore, and when at their wits' end, hailed the sight of an English man-of-war on her way home from the West Indies. Her commander consented to bear away with him those who wished to go, and promised to send speedy succor to those who stayed. The chaplain of the ship landed and baptized the little baby girl, Virginia Dare, together with Manteo, the first convert from the Indians. These were the first-fruits, not only of the Church of England, but of Christianity, in the colonies. Eighty of the company chose to stay, while the rest sailed away to merry England. Those who stayed, including the two women, were never heard of again. Their promised relief never came, or came so many years later that no living member of the colony was found. Half a century afterward Indians with blue eyes and brown hair were seen along the Potomac, who were supposed to have in their veins all that was left of the blood of the Raleigh colony.

In 1603 a ship's company spent the summer in Plymouth Harbor, on the coast of Massachusetts, but made no permanent lodgement.

In the spring of 1605 a company landed at the mouth of the Kennebec. While the summer lasted they thrived in the cabins and little garden patches which Gorges' colony. they planted, but in the long, bleak winter which followed they were reduced to starvation and despair, and returned hungry to England, carrying with them three Indian chieftains. These were taken in charge by a wealthy gentleman and zealous Churchman, Sir Ferdinando Gorges. For three years he kept them in his house, teaching them English, and learning from them about their people. Then he organized an expedition at his own charge, and brought it out himself, landing again at the Kennebec in the summer of 1606. By the time winter came his company had built a fort, a log church, and fifty cabins. This settlement of Churchmen maintained a precarious existence for many years; indeed, it never became quite extinguished. But it had for its enemies a cruel climate and a barren soil, and a few years' later the relentless enmity of the Massachusetts Puritans. The Church has had there a longer continuous existence than in any other place in America, but it did little more than live. It never became a colony, and hardly an organized church. It served for a century only to keep the lamp of the Church showing a flickering light in the New England.

All the "ventures," so far, were without recognition from either Church or State. They were the enterprises of individuals or companies without either political status or ecclesiastical authority.

It was to Virginia first that the Church and State of England were to be transplanted. Raleigh's ill-fated The Virginia Company. company had never been quite forgotten. Relief expeditions had been projected, and had come to nothing, until it was deemed too late to rescue them. But the memory of the flowery banks and fertile meadows of Albemarle had never quite passed away. London merchants thought of it as a new field for trade. Bishops and clergy thought of the Indians as heathen to be saved. Statesmen had it in mind as a place wherein to found new states. All England then dreamed of colonies. A company was formed, with archbishops, peers, merchants, and high officers of state for its members. Captain John Smith, who had come home from fighting the Turk under the walls of Constantinople, was secured as the military commander. The good priest Robert Hunt was commissioned chaplain. The Crown gave a grant of land from 34° to 45° north latitude, — from the Bay of Fundy to South Carolina. Substantial Churchmen, with their wives and children and goods, offered for colonists. Prayers were said in churches for the safety of the expedition. With the bishop's benediction, the king's favor, and the people's good-will, they sailed away. Their plan was to take up again Raleigh's abandoned settlement, and they were not without hope of being welcomed by some of his people, who might still be living. But the fleet lost its reckoning, and, instead of making a landfall at Albemarle, they sailed into Chesapeake Bay in April, 1607. They named their settlement for the king, Jamestown. By their charter the Law and the Church of England were made bounden. Their first act, on landing, was to kneel and hear Chaplain Hunt read the prayers and thanksgiving for a safe voyage. It is not our task to trace the civil and industrial prosperity of the colony. Their church was built as soon as their cabins were, and as they moved into better houses God's house was adorned to correspond. Their first sanctuary was, the chaplain writes, "a pen of poles with a sail for a roof, and for a pulpit a bar lashed between two convenient trees." In this rude temple the Holy Communion was celebrated for the first time in America, according to the Liturgy of the Church, June 21, 1607.

FRIEZE. ROBERT HUNT AND THE JAMESTOWN COLONY

The first church.

Virginia was marked off from the settlements soon to follow by two things, — it was a royal colony, and a Church one. It was simply a little English parish, bringing its minister, its Prayer-Book, its customs, and its thoughts, to set them down in the midst of an unoccupied land. It set about to reproduce the old home life, but it had to gain by bitter experience the knowledge of how to win a livelihood. — the knowledge which soon became a second nature to the settlers. They had to learn how to deal with the crafty natives, to coax a rich land to yield its substance, to learn new modes of husbandry, to adjust themselves to a new life. The task was a trying one. Cold, drought, malaria, and hunger brought them to the verge of despair, but through it all good Chaplain Hunt was their stay and comfort. If they were in perils oft, they were in prayer oft. At times they despaired. Once they determined to abandon the enterprise, but, while they were gathering to embark, the long-looked-for relief ship hove in sight, bearing supplies and new people. The shed in which the prayers had wont to be said was replaced by a more comfortable building, of which the chaplain speaks with grateful pleasantry as “a homely thing like a barn, set on cratchets, covered with rafters, sods, and brush.”

A wide-spread and deep interest was created in the settlement among all classes at home. To “have a venture” to the colonies quickly came to be the fashion. New-comers came out by the score. The population grew apace. Collections were taken by the Archbishop’s orders in the province of Canterbury for the Church in Virginia. One sent Bibles and Prayer-Books, and another, Communion plate. Chaplain Hunt did not long remain the only priest. Others came as they were needed. These first clergy were godly and well-learned men, — differing widely from the clerical adventurers who succeeded them a generation later. Good Church people at home promoted schemes for the advantage of their cousins in the Virginias. One society undertook to provide for them wives who should be worthy helpmeets for such men, and sent them over at a hundred pounds of tobacco a head. An official acknowledges in clerkly phrase the arrival of "two shiploads of women in fair condition."

English interest in ventures.

Their religious duty to the aborigines was not neglected. The good priest Alexander Whittaker gained for himself the title of "Apostle to the Indians." Indian children were secured and placed in the homes of the settlers, to be trained in decency and Christianity. Pocahontas, the comely daughter of the unfriendly chief Powhatau, was secured. The newly widowed John Rolf was moved alike by her beauty and her heathenism, and to make her a convert took her to wife. Other missionaries joined Whittaker in his work among the Virginians and in the forest. They reported to the authorities at home that there was every promise of bringing these heathen soon to a knowledge of the Gospel, and asked for still more men. The Indians were friendly, hospitable, and full of interest. But before the missionaries' report reached England the treacherous savages burst into the settlement, with the great massacre of May 22, 1622. Missionaries, converts, and frontier settlers were all alike butchered, and the work came to an end. It had run swiftly through all the phases which characterized the projects to Christianize the Indians for two centuries and more.

It is of interest to note that Virginia was the only place where a colony of Church people lived their life in the presence of hostile savages. The Puritans on the banks of the Connecticut, the Moravians in the valley of the Wyoming, the Presbyterians on the Alleghany, and the Baptists on the Holston and the Tennessee bore their rifles with them to Church and gathered their corn while listening for the dreaded war-whoop. But, save in the early days of Virginia, this was never the experience of Church of England people. There are no Boones and Crocketts, Robertsons and Clarkes in the annals of the American Church. People of another faith soon passed beyond them and formed a barrier behind which the Churchman was safe from this peril. But as the Churchman was shut off from the danger, so he was shut out from the kindly fellow-feeling which bound together the other peoples who through generations shared a common peril. This lack of sympathy deepened into rooted malevolence when a hundred and fifty years later the British government, to whom the Church was bound, took for allies the unspeakable savages whom the Baptists and Presbyterians had been fighting with for four generations.

Virginia soon recovered from the massacre of 1622. The colonist had learned his foe. Their valiant Captain Smith scouted along the frontiers and carried the war into the enemy's country. When he was about to start upon an expedition into the backwoods he received from the authorities orders that "every day the Prayers should be read, with a psalm," at which order being carried out he gravely records that "the salvages were mightily amazed."

Meanwhile the colony had grown apace. Two thousand immigrants arrived in a single year. Land-hunters pushed up the James, the Chickahominy, and the York. New settlements were planted and new parishes organized. The Church at home was mindful of its duty, and clergy came as fast as they were needed. In 1619, there were enough counties settled to send delegates who organized the first representative assembly in America. They met to establish self-government on this continent. By a strange irony, while they were in session, a Dutch ship, the "Jesus," brought to Jamestown and sold the first cargo of African slaves.¹

With the civil legislation of the Assembly we are not directly concerned. But their acts relating to religion show a vivid picture of the place and time. It was enacted² that:—

Care should be taken by the officers that the people resort to church on the Sabbath Day, the penalty of absence to be a pound of tobacco, or for a month's absence fifty pounds: that all who till the ground, of what quality soever, pay tithes to the minister; that there be throughout the colony an uniformity of Doctrine and Worship: that Ministers and Church Wardens present to the Midsummer Assizes a return of official acts, and also the names and offences of all persons of profane and ungodly life, common swearers, drunkards, blasphemers, neglecters of the Sacraments, Sabbath-breakers, adulterers, forni-

First representative assembly.

Laws concerning religion.

¹ Williams: History of Negro Race in America, vol. i. p. 116.

² Anderson: vol. i. p. 460.

eators, slanderers, and also of all Masters and Mistresses who neglect to catechise their children and servants; that no man shall disparage or speak lightly of a Magistrate or Minister, or be married other than by the Book of Common Prayer; that Ministers shall preach at each of their stations at least once a year; that they shall visit any one who is dangerously sick; shall administer the Sacrament at least three times a year; shall not drink to excess, dice or play cards for money; that each minister shall have a hundred pounds of tobacco per year, and also the twentieth calf, pig, and kid, these to be kept by the owner till weaned and then rendered by the Church Warden at a time and place publicly fixed: that if the Church Warden fail to render them the value be collected from him by distress; that the fee for each marriage shall be two shillings, for christening nothing, for churching one shilling, and for burying one shilling; that the cost of raising and repairing churches shall be assessed upon the parishes; that the members of the Legislature shall attend Divine Service "upon the thyrd beatinge of a drume" under a fine of two shillings sixpence.

The resemblance of these enactments of the Episcopalians of Virginia to those soon to be passed by the Puritan colony of Massachusetts will suggest itself at once. But when the two legislations come to be compared, both in matter and in spirit, the difference will be still more evident. They both trespass upon what seems to us to be liberty of conscience. But there is an inquisitory particularity of interference with personal rights, and a savage religiosity, in the Puritans' laws, which is not present in those of the Churchmen. They approached their task of law-making with radically different tempers and purposes. The Virginians were content when they had made such regulations as they deemed necessary to the well-being of society. The Puritans felt themselves responsible for the present and eternal destiny of the individual. The Churchmen legislated for this life only, and had sufficient understanding to fulfil their task fairly well. The Puritans legislated for the life eternal. It was because they encroached upon the prerogatives of God that they made havoc of men.

Spirit of the laws.

At first the acts of the Assembly were easily enforced; in fact they enforced themselves. They but expressed the wishes of the people in the premises. But with the increase of immigration the character of the population changed. At first it was all of those who were emphatically "for Church and Crown." The wives kindly sent out to the settlers were all Churchwomen. The Archbishop of Canterbury was their patron, and the Bishop of London was a director in the company. But as the country opened up, and the tobacco and fur trade became more lucrative, men of another sort began to come. Men who sat loosely to both Church and Crown came for fortunes, and Puritans and Quakers came for broader liberty. These last were not molested. The not very onerous tax needed to support the Establishment, regularly levied, was paid by them without any evidence of reluctance. A man in Virginia was much more ready to pay his tax to support a Church whose advantages for himself and his children he could have for the asking, than was a man in Massachusetts to support an Establishment whose spiritual benefactions were denied him until he should first pass a rigorous examination as to his own spiritual state. What men always and everywhere rebel against is the application of a human test to separate the sheep from the goats. In Massachusetts the sheep were marked and goats were branded. In Virginia sheep and goats were both alike shorn for the support of the fold which was open to them both. Little by little the Church relaxed its laws, and we must say Relaxation of manners. also, its manners. Plantation life grew easy and abundant. Theology never throve in it. The clergy began to be planters on their own account, and were content, for the most part, to be good men and good neighbors. Missionary zeal slowly died out. The Dissenters built their meeting-houses undisturbed, sometimes aided by the gift of a generous slice of land from the parson's own plantation. Colonel Esmond is a fair type of the Virginia Churchman, who began to be seen half a century earlier than Thackeray places him. The colony grew to be peaceful, prosperous, and safe. Complacent, with no very exalted ideals either in religion or morals, its general loyalty to Church and Crown remained unchanged. When the Commonwealth came, the Virginians utterly refused to recognize the disestablishment of the Church in England, and ignored the Perfect Model of the "Saints." At the Restoration they pursued the even tenor of a way they had never interrupted. When the eighteenth century opened, the Church was recognized by the law, and, upon the whole, contained the people, of the colony.

From it we now turn to look at that rival English people who first became its neighbors in the New World.

CHAPTER III.

THE PURITANS.

To comprehend the Puritans in New England we must first look at them in Old England. The Acts of "Uniformity" and "Supremacy" precipitated the confused ecclesiastical life in England into its three component ingredients, Churchmen, Romanists, and Independents. They compelled men to range themselves. It took half a generation for them to find out definitely to which camp each belonged, but it created the necessity for an ultimate choice, however long it might be postponed. The three camps were very unequal in size. The Romanists were few in numbers and utterly discredited in the eyes of the people, in point of their faith and their loyalty.

Churchmen and "Puritans," however, were not very unequal in weight and numbers. Romanists and Puritans complained of the same grievances. It was the "Supremacy" even more than the "Uniformity" which burdened their souls. They might possibly have borne the enforced Liturgy, which was less an abomination before it was enforced. This they could have learned to endure, and might have learned to love. At worst, this only constrained their conduct. But the Supremacy touched their souls. To the Romanist, the Supreme Head of the Church was division.

Not unequal

Christ, and the Pope his vice-gerent. To the Puritan the Supreme Head of the Church was Christ, and He had and could have no vice-gerent. To compel one upon his faith as a Christian to swear allegiance to any secular authority, was not tolerable. Romanist and Puritan alike held that between the Church and the State there could be no compact made as between equals, but that in the organization of society the secular must be subordinate to the spiritual. The Puritan could not find it in his conscience to answer before any civil tribunal for his religious conduct, much less to swear upon his faith as a Christian that he would acknowledge any mortal man, even though he be King of England, as "Supreme Head of the Church." It was worse than Popery! It was a doctrine of devils! It was Antichrist! He would go to jail first; he would fight; he would emigrate, and found a society where Antichrist would not be allowed to exalt himself into the seat of God; a society in which the saints should rule as they had the right to reign.

To the Churchman this position was incomprehensible. To his mind, England was simply a nation composed of Christian men, in which the Church and the State were not differentiated and could not be. The King as head of the realm was head of the Church, ipso facto. To quarrel with it was like quarrelling with the structure of the human body or the solar system. The man who did so must either be mad or have some sinister motive which he hid behind the plea of a tender conscience. It was as reasonable and natural for King and Parliament to decree a doctrine theory.

Churchmen's

as to levy a tax, to punish a heretic as to imprison a thief, — for were they not both offenders against the common order? For any man to boggle at avowing his allegiance to the powers ordained by God, was to avow himself a bad citizen, and bad citizens should be made to feel the hand of the law.

One little group of men there was who were wise beyond their time. They saw even then that religious and secular things each had their own sphere. The Pilgrims. They perceived that while the Church is “the blessed company of all faithful people,” it has its existence in a world filled with all people. They saw that while Christians live in the State they must, perforce, have relations with it. They dreamed of no theocracy where the saints should reign as the chosen of God; but they did dream of a state where the things that belong to God and the things that belong to Cæsar might be mutually apportioned in peace. Under the lead of their good pastor, John Robinson, a priest of the Church of England, and one of the noblest men of his own or any time, this little band of pilgrims set upon their wanderings in search of their new Canaan. They sought it first in Holland. But after half a generation their hearts turned back to Merrie England. They wished their children to retain their mother tongue. There was not room for them and theirs in the dyke-belted Low Countries. To England they could not return. Their thoughts roved over the sea to where the English flag was planted on an unpossessed land. The good ship Mayflower carried them away, and in 1620 they landed in Plymouth Bay. But they were men born out of due time. Their little company never grew large. Their pious leader said of them, more truly than he knew, that "they knew they were pilgrims, and looked not much on the things of earth, but lifted up their eyes to heaven, their dearest country, and quieted their spirits." "Deeply touched as all must be by the idyllic grace of the story of the Pilgrims, and pleasant as it is to linger over it, yet candor compels us to acknowledge that the true genesis of New England life is not to be traced to Plymouth, and that the Pilgrims had no direct and but little indirect influence in shaping its later development."¹

It was with the Puritan colony who landed in Massachusetts Bay in 1629 that the New England life really began. Five ships brought them over, two hundred and fifty strong. The projector of the enterprise was Arthur Lake, the Puritan Bishop of Bath and Wells. He declared that if he were not so old he would go out with the colony himself.² It is interesting to speculate what might have been the development of Puritan New England if Bishop Lake had come! But all the colonists were members of the English Church. Their leader was Rev. John White, Vicar of Dorchester. Francis Skelton of Clare Hall, and Francis Higginson of Jesus College, Cambridge, Episcopal Ministers both, were forward in the enterprise. Why, then, did a company of English Churchmen, led by priests, and with a bishop for their patron, leaving home with words of love for their Mother on their lips, become her sullen and relentless foes? It is not necessary and would not be true to charge them either with hypocrisy or ingratitude. The logic of events is more potent than the theories of man. The root of the quarrel was partly in the situation and partly in the unconscious temper of the men themselves.

The Salem colony.

¹ Bishop Harris: Christianity and Civil Society, p. 95.

² Bancroft: vol. i. p. 264, last edition.

The theory of England was that every subject of the realm was a member of the Church. The relation established a mutual obligation. It formed the English theory of the Church. basis for protection and control on the one side; it created the duty of obedience and support on the party of the second part. The King was to be a nursing father to the Church, but a father whose counsels must be heeded under penalty. The leaders of the Church naturally subscribed to the theory. They were glad to believe that Church and State were each necessary to the other, but they made the sad blunder of identifying the State with the Crown. They hailed as almost divine wisdom the apothegm of the "wisest fool in Christendom," when he summed up the whole situation in his famous words, "No bishop, no king."¹ They established the ill-omened conjunction of Episcopacy and Monarchy. It did not occur to them that the obverse of James I's aphorism might sometime be deemed true, — No king, no bishop. It seemed to them that they were doing well and wisely by linking Episcopacy to that institution which seemed to the world of their day the most abiding of all things. But their mistake well nigh worked ruin to the Church. It led it to form that fatal friendship with the Stuarts which brought Episcopacy into discredit with half of England, extinguished it in Scotland, and made it impossible for a hundred and fifty years in America. This ill-starred alliance remained as a sentiment many a year after it had degenerated from a mere mistake of judgment to a very inanity. There are probably not wanting Churchmen even yet who, in defiance of the facts of history, and with slight regard for the honor of the Ten Commandments, still think and speak of "the blessed martyr, King Charles."¹ And this in the face of the fact that, with the single exception of poor Queen Anne, the Church has never had a whole-hearted friend on the English throne, from the time of James I. until now.

¹ Graham: Colonial History of the United States, vol. i. p. 139.

Whitgift did not scruple to declare that "undoubtedly his Majesty spoke by the special assistance of God's Spirit."

Now, when the Puritans left England they unconsciously turned their backs to the theory upon which the Church had taken its stand. Even had Puritans and their theory. the theory been true, it would have been impossible of application to a people angered for other causes, and farther away from the machinery of government than now would be a colony on Lake Nyanza. When they landed, and saw the situation, they saw they had expatriated themselves. They had left both Church and State behind. The Episcopate, by becoming the creature of the Crown, had lost its power to follow the Church's children. Had the English Church understood then what both her fathers and her sons have known, the true catholic and independent foundation of the Church, she could have adjusted her spiritual machinery to this and all the colonies. But the things which made for her peace were hid from her eyes. The Salem colony saw at once what it took the people of Maryland and Virginia a century to realize, — that the Church of England, holding the theories she did, could never become the Church of the colonies, however deeply she might yearn over her departing children.

¹ A well-known bishop, still living, tells of a Scotch clergyman who, while visiting in this country, was asked by him before going to Church, if he would object at all to reading the Prayer for the President.

"Hoot, man," was his reply, "dinna I pray for the Hoose o' Hanover?"

But this necessity to live their own life, apart from their old relations, was realized by the Puritans quite as much, or more, through their temper than through their understanding. It was easy for them to reach a conclusion which, though logical, was entirely in accord with their wishes. The Puritan's temper has been his bane, while the Churchman's has been his strong deliverer. The former is now only a character in history, while the latter is a present force, chiefly because, in the long run, moral qualities win over intellectual ones. In the long and weary conflict of the Church with dissent, — that conflict precipitated by the Act of Uniformity, patched up by the Toleration Act of 1688, and only ended within the memory of living men, — the strong weapon of the Church has been a certain broad kindness of spirit. This, in the Puritans, was wanting. Their sour, saturnine, ultra-logical, disputatious temper led them, in Massachusetts, almost at once to the betrayal of their principles. They had come to found a State. Their ill-regulated enthusiasm changed their purpose, and they set about to found a Church.

The prodigious rapidity of growth which marks the colony shows that there were multitudes like-minded with them. Immigrants came out by the scores and hundreds. In the tenth year after their landing at Salem, a single fleet of twenty ships brought three thousand at one time. Before the colony was twenty years old it had pushed its outposts to the Connecticut, and planted settlements at Windsor and Hartford. They had followed the coast to Saybrook and New Haven, had crossed the Sound to Long Island, and planted a settlement at the mouth of the Housatonic.

And all this was done in the face of a fierce climate, a sterile soil, ferocious savages, and wild beasts. The grimness of the Nature where they struggled reproduced itself again in the tempers of the men. The kindly Englishmen of old Boston and Dorchester became the gloomy, rigid religionists of the new towns which bore the old names. By the middle of the century they had founded fifty towns and villages, in each of which the ministers and magistrates were the sterner censors of the religion and manners of their stern people. From the first it had been determined that none but godly members of the Church should possess the rights of citizenship. This accepted principle could not but beget both fanatics and hypocrites. They were dominated by the idea that they held the place in the New World which the chosen people of God had held in the old economy. They were to go in and possess the land; to destroy utterly the old Canaanites; not to permit a witch to live; to observe all the commandments and statutes of the Lord to do them. They would have none but Church-members for freemen. They called their children Patience, Faith, Prudence, Deliverance, Thankful, and Hold-fast. Their laws present a picture of their lives.¹ Roman Catholics and Quakers were to be banished, and upon their return executed; shipmasters were forbidden to bring in any of that accursed sect or their writings; it was forbidden to run or walk on the Sabbath Day, except "reverently to meeting;" to sweep the house, to cook, or to shave; mothers were advised not to kiss their children on the Lord's Day; adultery, blasphemy, and idolatry were punishable by death; heresy and keeping Christmas Day, by fine and the stocks; absence from public worship, by fine and whipping; renouncing Church membership, or questioning the canonicity of any book in the Bible, by fine and banishment; all gaming was prohibited and cards and dice forbidden to be imported; dancing anywhere, and kissing a woman in the street, "even in the way of honest salutation," was punished by flogging; women were forbidden under penalty of imprisonment to wear clothing beyond their station in life, to cut their hair like a man; and for speaking ill of the minister, to have their tongues fastened in a split stick.

Puritan
laws.

Nor were these decrees empty threats.² Extracts

¹ It is hardly needful to say that the oft-quoted "Blue Laws" are of no historic value. The authorities are,—

The Book of General Laws and Liberties; by authority of the General Court of Massachusetts 1640: Printed at Cambridge 1660; pp. 3, 8, 9, 26, 33, 35, 38, 69, 74; The same, revised and reprinted by Saml. Green, Cambridge 1672. General Laws and Liberties of Connecticut; Revised and Published by order of General Assembly; Hartford 1672: pp. 28, 37, 21. In illustration of these are the Abridgment of Ordinances of New England; Neal; Hutchison; and Graham: Colonial History of United States. This last has the indorsement of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

² Graham: Colonial History of United States, vol. i. p. 189. Note.

from the early records of the Massachusetts courts show that John Wedgewood, for being in the company of drunkards, is ordered to sit in the stocks; Catherine, the wife of Richard Cornish, was found suspicious of light conduct and admonished to take heed; Thomas Pettit, for suspicion of slander and stubbornness, to be severely whipped; Josiah Plaistowe, for stealing four baskets of corn, to be hereafter called by the name "Josias and not Mr.," as heretofore. A farmer in the New Hampshire settlement barely escaped excommunication, by confession and repentance, for having killed a bear which was tearing up his garden on Sunday.

One may readily suppose that this unnatural manner of religious life would revenge itself. "Religentem esse oportet, non religiosum." The constant checking and repression of the natural life turned men's minds inward upon themselves. The hard mechanical service of rule was more than they could bear. The story of the internal revolts against it has often been told. The Baptists challenged it, and were coldly told to go elsewhere. The Quakers provoked it, and felt the dreadful weight of its hand. We are only concerned to ask, How shall the Church of England find a lodgement in such a society?

There is a feeble little settlement of Church people on the Kennebec, and the rapidly developing colony in Virginia, but these have their hands more than full with their own affairs. If the Church is to be planted in New England, Old England must do it. No one would have prophesied in 1640 that two centuries and a half later the

Planting of the Church in New England.

most rapid growth of the Episcopal Church would be in Massachusetts and Connecticut. Certainly there was nothing then to indicate it.

When Sir Ferdinando Gorges' son Robert brought his little colony to the "Wessagusset" in 1623, an English clergyman was in the company as chaplain. In the late summer, when the colonists' cabins had been built and their gardens were growing, the chaplain, with a few companions, went for a visit to their neighbors at Plymouth. The first summer voyage of pleasure along the silent coast of Maine was this. The good Plymouth people received their guests with a hearty welcome. The best they had was set before them. In the intolerable loneliness of the grim solitude, a visitor was a godsend. The talk was upon the work in which both settlements were engaged. But the priestly capacity of their guest was silently ignored. As an Englishman and a fellow backwoodsman they would give him of their best. But when the Sunday came he was allowed to take his seat on the benches while their own pastor held forth. The visit was not greatly prolonged and was never repeated.

Even at that early day there were Churchmen in Massachusetts. One of them, John Morton, was a conspicuous figure in the earliest settlements. John Morton. He had been a rich man and a generous liver in England. The attractive field which the New World offered for adventure and fortune drew him as it did so many of his kind. In 1623 he took up a plantation, including the present town of Quincy. He brought with him thirty servants, stock, utensils, and furniture. With his people about him, on the fat land he lived a jolly life. Choleric, devout, profane, and generous, he lived in Massachusetts the typical English squire. A tall pole set on the bluff in front of his house bore an English pennant. On Christmas Day abundant roasts of venison and mince pies galore rejoiced his people. Every morning he read prayers before his household, and on Sunday acted as their reader. So long as the kindly Pilgrims were his only neighbors, there was no attempt to interfere with his ways. But when the Puritans came and multiplied, Morton's manners could no longer be tolerated. Presently he had a visit from "that worthy gentleman, John Endicott, of Boston," who grimly ordered the flagpole to be cut down and "to look to it there should be better walking." Morton raged and fumed and was roundly fined for "ungodly speech." He certainly did swear. He declared in a letter to a friend, "I found in these parts two sets of people, Christians and heathens, and these last more friendly and full of humanity." He refused to pay his fine, and was clapped in the bilboes. His servants and tenants were sharply brought into Puritan order. The stout old offender himself was packed off to England and warned to stay there. His offences were gravely asserted to be these two:—being "of a gay humor," and using the Book of Common Prayer. To the mind of the Puritan these were capital. One of them was an offence against the eternal fitness of things, and the other against the solemn judgment of the saints. In England Morton was foolish enough to write a book about his American neighbors. A copy of it found its way to Boston. It was not pleasant reading for "the worthy

Mr. Endicott" and his friends. Still more foolishly, Morton ventured to follow his book himself, and came back to gather up the fragments of his estate. He had better have let it go. No sooner had he returned than he was seized and imprisoned. Several years of such discipline broke the old man's spirit and heart both, and he laid him down and died.

In the original Puritan company were two brothers, Brown by name, a lawyer and a merchant, who declined The Brown brothers. to join in the action by which the company separated from the Church. They had been born and reared in it, like all the others, and saw no reason why they should turn their backs upon it. When they landed, and had built their little cabins in the new town of Salem, they continued to gather their families morning and evening, and read with them the daily prayers. For a while this was coldly permitted by their neighbors. But presently the brothers ventured to gather a company together in a place distinct from the public assembly, and there "sundry times the Book of Common Prayer was read unto such as resorted thither." This that worthy gentleman Mr. Endicott could not endure. He "convented" the brothers before himself and the ministers. Very plain speech ensued. The ministers argued that the enforced use of the Prayer-Book was the very thing they had not been able to abide on the other side of the water, and that it would be the height of folly to allow it to creep into a place of honor here. The Browns replied, reminding them of the language they themselves had used only a few weeks before, when they had solemnly declared that they had no notion of separating from the Church their mother, but only to protest against her abuses and corruptions. The Prayer-Book they certainly could not call a corruption, since it had been used till lately by themselves, and was, in substance, either the words of God or of godly men. They accused the ministers openly, and not politely — for they were sturdy Englishmen, these Browns — of being “separatists” and “Anabaptists.” The governor and council, however, “finding these two to be of high spirit and their speeches and practices tending to mutiny and faction,” — the governor told them that “New England was no place for such as they.” The governor was quite right. The New England of that time was no place for any except that peculiar people who had embarked upon their religio-political experiment, nor would it be until that experiment should have been carried out to its necessary failure. The Browns, with their families, were ordered to return to England, which they did within the year, losing their share in the colonial venture.

While the Salem people were diligently purging their colony of the Church leaven, a Church of England clergyman was quietly living and prospering, far away from neighbors, where Boston now stands. The Rev. William Blaxton was a quiet, peaceable man, who, wearied with the din of religious controversy at home, had come to America to be at rest. He had taken up a farm, built a comfortable house, planted orchards, and made for himself and family a pleasant home, before the Salem people came.

The Rev.
William Blaxton.

It was not to exercise his ministry he had come, but to escape the strife of tongues. One day in 1630, Winthrop, with a little band of land-hunters, laid down their packs and built their fire at Charlestown. Blaxton's servants reported their presence, and the kindly man brought the cold and hungry hunters to his house. They admired his place "as a paradise," being chiefly delighted with his apples, whose fragrance reminded them of home. From his house they went morning by morning to their clearings, building their cabins in Charlestown, to which they soon removed. New settlers flocked in, and the town of Boston grew apace. Soon Blaxton was surrounded. His peaceful solitude was gone. A town was built and a community organized around him. He was graciously permitted to become a "freeman;" but his Episcopal neighbors Maverick and Walford were denied the same privilege. No attempt was made by Blaxton to hold services of the Church. But gradually and surely he was made to feel that "New England was no place for such as he." When the town passed an order that only those of the "Established Order" should be counted as freemen, thus taking away his citizenship, he sadly accepted its paltry offer of one hundred and fifty dollars for his property, and moved away. "I left England," he says, "because I misliked my lords the bishops: I leave here because I like still less my lords the brethren." Providence, in Rhode Island, afforded him an asylum, as it had Roger Williams. The effect of his removal was to quicken his own zeal in his office. He began at once in his new home to officiate as a minister, and continued to do so until he died, an old man.

Blaxton's removal closed the Prayer-Book in Massachusetts for fifty years. The Churchmen who were in the colony then, as well as the considerable number who came from time to time, conformed with what grace they could to the "Established Order." They went to the meeting-house, had their children baptized by and received the Sacrament at the hands of the Puritan ministers. It was the easier for them to do so for the reason that the early Puritan ministers had been in point of fact Episcopally ordained; and also because the idea of the exclusive validity of Episcopal Orders was not generally entertained at that time by the great majority of Churchmen even in England. By conforming to the Puritan order of things they did violence only to their tastes and habits and not their consciences.

But by this time the zeal of the Puritans had grown into bigotry. They were not content with closing the Prayer-Book in their own territory. Massachusetts claimed jurisdiction over the Eastern Colony as well. Nothing less than the suppression of the Church there would content them. By vexatious legal proceedings, and by still harder measures, they, to all practical purposes, succeeded. By 1680 there was only one Episcopal clergyman in the whole of New England. Old Father Jordan still lived in Portsmouth, but broken in fortune and in spirit.

New England had purged herself of all disturbers of the peace. The Baptists had been banished to Rhode Island. The Quakers had been whipped and driven into the wilderness. The Churchmen had been harried either into conformity or exile. But their success was its own Nemesis.

In 1684 their charter was withdrawn. They had sided with Parliament against the Crown. When the Withdrawal of the charter. Crown was at last triumphant the enmities they had so diligently cultivated returned to plague them. They might no longer be trusted with the powers of government. The American Theocracy, after a gloomy life of sixty years, fell in a day. By the resumption of the charter, Massachusetts, including all the territory east of the New York line, became a "royal" colony.¹ Its special privileges were gone. Its territory became again part of the kingdom. The Church of England became established in the eyes of English law.

A wide door seemed now to be opened to the Church. But, unfortunately, her champions proved as ready to take the sword as their enemies had been. They had now the secular power on their side. But it was British power. It required still another century of failure before the Church could learn that this which she so fondly believed to be her strength was her hopeless weakness. Meanwhile she exploited it.

On a May day in 1686 the man-of-war Rose sailed into Boston harbor, bearing the first governor and the Church leaning upon British Government. first incumbent. The ill-starred alliance began its century of failure. Boston had five thousand inhabitants, and three meeting-houses. The frigate arrived on a Thursday. On Sunday the new clergyman read service and preached in the Town House. The room was small and ill arranged. But it was packed, and a great crowd of curious hung about the open door and windows. Mr. Ratcliffe was pronounced on all hands to be "an extraordinary fine preacher." Next day a wedding was celebrated, and with a ring! During the week Mr. Ratcliffe formally requested from the Town Council the use of one of the meeting-houses to hold service in. His request was refused, and he was recommended to continue using the Town House. The governor, following his instructions, did not interfere. The people of the town, of whom a considerable number had always held in spirit to the Church of their birth, continued to attend the services in the hall. In June they took steps to organize a parish. A vestry was chosen, composed of Ed. Randolph, Captain Lydgett, Messrs. Luscombe, White, Macartie, Clarke, Turferry, Ravenscroft, and Bullivant. The rector's salary was fixed at $200 a year. They asked for a share of the fund raised by taxation in the town, for the support of public worship, and were refused. Every slight and affront which might safely be used was put upon them. Social pressure in its extremest form was brought to bear against any who might forsake the meeting-house for the Church. But the congregation continued to grow until the mean Town House could in no wise accommodate it. They tried to borrow one of the meeting-houses at such times as it was not in use by its own congregation. They were answered that "we cannot, with a good conscience, consent that our meeting-house should be made use of for the Common-Prayer worship."

¹ Graham: Colonial History of U.S., vol. i. p. 254.

Parish organized in Boston.

Upon the arrival of Andros as governor, the situation took on a new complexion. He was too domineering in temper and too pronounced a Churchman to carry out effectively the conciliatory policy which the home government was just then experimenting with. For six months, in obedience to instruction, he put enough constraint upon himself to keep his official hands off. He went with the other Episcopalians to the little Town House and sat upon the hard benches with what dignity and comfort he could. But after six months his ill-disguised impatience broke out. The personal discomfort might have been endured. The hinderance to the growth of the Church, as such, did not disturb him much. But that his Excellency the Governor, the representative of His Royal Majesty, should be stewed week after week in a mean little barn, while the rascally, canting, crop-eared Puritans should be sitting at their ease in comfortable sanctuaries, — this was not to be borne! By the governor's order the "Old South Meeting-House" was appropriated to the new parish for morning service, leaving its own congregation to use it in the afternoon, if they liked. There was no appeal from this order to any human authority. The Puritans therefore changed the venue to a court in which it had always been their peculiarity to believe themselves influential; they appointed and kept a day of fasting and prayer. They also made representations to the governor which led him to partially relax the order. The meeting-house was to be used on alternate Sunday mornings by the two congregations. For

Governor
Andros.

Joint use of meetinghouse.

some time this arrangement continued. But it worked badly. The Churchmen, when it was their morning in possession, grew strongly rubrical, which made the service so long that the afternoon was half spent before the Puritans could have their turn. When the Puritans were in possession they "had such freedom" in prayer and the expounding of the Word, that no time was left for Evening Prayer. The unseemly spectacle became common Sunday after Sunday of one congregation, shivering in an ill-humor outside, waiting for the one piously chuckling inside to have done and get away. The Church had been placed, as usual, by the governor, in a false position. They had no right to the meeting-house at all, either at law or in equity. In England such a thing as its forcible use would have been impossible, and this the Boston people very well knew. There was nothing for the Church to do but to abandon its claim with what grace it might. They determined to build for themselves. A subscription was started for the purpose, which produced a sufficient amount almost at once. Pity they had not done it six months sooner. For by now the Puritans were so exasperated that they refused to sell a foot of ground for any such purpose. Sewall, in his Diary, writes: "Captain Davis spoke to me to-day for land to set a church on. Told him I could not and would not put Mr. Cotton's land to such a use: first, because I would not set up that which the people of New England came over to avoid; and secondly, the land was entailed!" After repeated failure to make private purchase, the governor came again with heavy hand to the rescue. By pressure and thinly disguised threats, he persuaded the council to cede enough of common land for the purpose. On King's Chapel built. it the "King's Chapel" was built, at a cost of $1,800. With a church of its own, the parish grew more rapidly and more wholesomely.

But when the news of the Revolution of 1688 reached New England, and it was learned that the trusty Protestant, and, as they believed, Presbyterian, William of Orange, was on the throne, the Puritans thought their innings had come. Without waiting for accurate information, they clapped Governor Andros into jail, shipped the Episcopal rector off to England, smashed the windows of the church, pelted its walls with mud and filth, mobbed and harried the Churchmen within an inch of their lives. For months the poor, dilapidated church stood silent and desolate, bearing scurrilous extempores scribbled on its walls alluding to Jezebel and the Scarlet Whore.

But the Puritans presently discovered that they had been premature. They learned that William was not the man they had taken him to be. With no enthusiastic love to the Church, — or to anything else, for that matter, — it was now his Church, officially, and must be decently treated. He was as ready to lay his hand upon an ultra-Puritan as an ultra-Papist; and his hand was not a pleasant one to be touched with angrily. The gloomy Bostonians had the mortification to see the rector come back again, with, as they phrased it, "seven other devils worse than himself." The church was rehabilitated, services recommenced, new books, plate, and paraphernalia of worship brought in, the scattered congregation regathered and increased, and the worship of God by the Common Prayer set up, to grow steadily through two centuries, till now the Church in New England includes in her roll of members the name borne by almost every prominent Puritan in the early annals of the colony. While the Church stood with the Crown against the popular will, they hated her with that sustained and smouldering hatred of which only Puritans were capable. When that unholy alliance was shaken loose, and the Church had the chance to show what she is in herself, the grandsons of her enemies became her loving children.

Thirty years ago a tablet of brass was set in the rebuilt wall of the "Founders' Chapel" of St. Botolph's Church in old Boston, Lincolnshire. It bears an inscription to the memory of John Cotton, the Puritan preacher of new Boston, Massachusetts. When the chapel was re-opened the flags of England and America floated together from the tower, in sign that the old quarrel was over and past. The Bishop of London, Laud's successor, was present, and the Bishop of Lincoln preached fittingly from the text, "Let us build with you, for we seek God as ye do."¹ ended.

The quarrel

¹ Thornton: The Pulpit of the Revolution, p. xxii.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

IN the early years of Elizabeth's reign the ambassador of his Most Catholic Majesty of Spain wrote to his master that the royal virgin was, in his judgment, "possessed of a hundred thousand devils." If this were true, it is likely that the task assigned to five legions of them was to harry the English Parliament; the other five were occupied with the Puritans. When James I succeeded, the Romanists came to believe that a wholesale exorcism had been wrought in the kingdom. It was true that James was more of a Protestant than Elizabeth, so far as theological definitions are concerned. Nothing would have pleased the royal theologaster better than a set discussion with the Pope himself; but he differed radically from the leonine queen in temper. He would argue with the Romanists by the week, but he would not cut their heads off. By Elizabeth's method argument is quickly ended, by James's it may be continued.

This being the king's disposition, when George Calvert, one of his state officers, became a pervert to Romanism in 1624, he did not thereby forfeit the royal favor. He was made Lord Baltimore in lieu of the honorable offices this step compelled him to relinquish. But he thereby cast his lot with a people who had been, upon the whole, fairly judged, and more.

Lord Balti-

lay under the popular verdict of bad Christians and untrustworthy Englishmen. For this cause the rights of citizenship had been taken away from them. They held their fortunes and lives by sufferance, and both were often in jeopardy. Calvert made himself intimately acquainted with their situation. His connection by marriage with Sir Thomas Arundel, their chief adviser, gave him opportunity to know their needs and wishes. He was already one of the original members of the Virginia Council. This fact probably suggested his scheme to him. The Puritans had their colony, why should not the Romanists have theirs? They could there escape the social and political disabilities which their fathers had brought upon them, and maybe add a new jewel to the much-battered tiara. In any case, in the New World the priest would not be compelled to disguise himself in Hodge's smock-frock or the livery of a footman, and the people to hear mass with guarded doors, and in deadly fear of the hangman's knife.

Thus Maryland, like the other earliest colonies, started with a distinctly religious motive. It was to be a refuge and a seed-plot for English Roman Catholics.

For this purpose, openly avowed, Lord Baltimore received from Charles I a patent for the territory lying between the mouth of the Potomac and the fortieth degree of north latitude, and running westward indefinitely.¹ Before the charter received the imprint of the Great Seal, Baltimore died. Leonard Calvert, his son, took up his father's task. Romish noblemen and gentlemen furnished the outfit, and their humbler followers became the colonists. Two ships, the Ark and the Dove, bore the company of a hundred people. They were the best equipped and furnished of all the early companies. They sailed from Cowes, November 22, 1633. After a long and stormy voyage, in which they were driven by stress of weather to the Barbadoes and Montserrat, they entered the mouth of the Potomac, which they consecrated to St. Gregory, and rechristened the two capes which clip its mouth Cape St. Gregory and Cape St. Michael. The islands they sailed by, they called St. Clement, St. Catherine, and St. Cecilia. On this last they landed, and the two Jesuits sent by their provincial with the expedition, Father Andrew White and Father John Altham, said mass for the company on Annunciation Day, 1634. Thence they moved to the Maryland shore, and unloaded their goods at St. Mary's. "There," says Bancroft, "religious liberty obtained a home, its only home in the wide world."

¹ Shea: Catholic Church in Colonial Days, p. 34.

This last declaration has been so often made, that in the interest of common justice it should be qualified and supplemented. Things which differ ought to be distinguished. That Roman Catholics should be claimed as the champions of religious liberty in the seventeenth century, seems sufficiently grotesque to the student of history.¹ The simple truth in the premises is this: the Calverts did believe and practise so; the Roman Church did neither the one nor the other. The settlers of Maryland were

Romanists
and religious liberty.

¹ This claim was the burden of the addresses at the Roman Catholic Conference at Baltimore in October, 1889.

too glad to find safety to think of persecution. Not that they would have done so if they could. They should have, ungrudged, their meed of praise; but they must not have all the praise. It must not be forgotten that their new home was given them by a Protestant king, with the hearty advice and approval of a Protestant council, who in so doing waived their own claims in the interest of their misguided but still loved countrymen. They made the gift with their eyes open. English Romanists were utterly discredited as citizens. It was not alone or chiefly that their religion was abhorrent. By their own declaration they took their political orders from an enemy whom England could not then afford to despise. Romanists in England meant servants of the Papacy and agents of the king of Spain. Despite of this, Protestant Englishmen gave them that peaceful home in Maryland, which had already been brutally refused them: by their French co-religionists in Newfoundland.¹ The founders were of those few in their day who were Catholics rather than Romanists, and Englishmen before either. Such were the Calverts, a noble race with few contemporaries and fewer descendants. They had neither the will nor the power of intolerance. But they laid no claim to toleration as a virtue. They simply recognized existing facts. The first offer of persecution by the Maryland colony would have brought such a storm about them as would have swept them into the ocean. Churchmen and Quakers, Baptists and Puritans, would have combined to exterminate the ingrates.

Persecution by them impossible.

¹ Shea: Catholic Church in Colonial Days, p. 32.

They were glad to leave England, and there is serious reason to believe that they were not altogether sorry to be three thousand miles farther away from Rome. Their chosen priests were Jesuits, and the Society of Jesus was not then in favor at Rome. It had already launched upon that policy of adaptability to every circumstance, which made it distrusted and finally led to its suppression by the Pope himself. Dominicans, Capuchins, and Franciscans were those whom Rome then looked upon with favor. The judgment of the Roman Church was at one with that of the Puritan upon this question. Cotton Mather spoke for both when he pronounced "toleration — a doctrine of devils." The Calverts and their friends were as far removed from the spirit of their Church as from that of their times. They were never looked upon kindly by their spiritual superiors, and when the last of them returned to England the Romish King, James II, refused to receive him.¹

This colony, with its exceptional advantages of equipment, soil, and climate, filled up more slowly than any of its compeers. At first the immigrants were of the same faith as the founders. But this supply of men was quickly exhausted. The truth was, there were few of that sort among the English-speaking people to draw from. The stream of immigration soon became Protestant. Before a generation had passed, these last were in the majority; before the end of the century they were ten to one.² While there was no religious establishment, the offices of the province were all rigidly kept in the hands of Roman Catholics, and this even after they had become less than one-tenth of the population. No open obstacle was placed in the way of Protestant worship, but any official advantage available was lent to that of Rome. Occasional services of the Church of England were held almost from the first, by clergy from Virginia, from New England, and by occasional visitors from England. In a few places services were kept up with regularity for considerable periods, but the record of them in detail is not now extant.

¹ Hawks: Ecclesiastical Contributions, vol. ii. p. 56.

² Ib. p. 73; Shea, p. 26.

In Cromwell's time the Commonwealth sent over a commission to set up the "New Model," and Romanists and Churchmen were both suppressed.

At the Restoration things returned to the same state as before.

Ten years later the Roman Catholic population had been engulfed.¹ The Italian plant in America had withered, and did not revive again, till the stream of Irish immigration poured over it in the middle of this present century.

When this condition had been reached, the people of Maryland effected, rightly, the "Protestant Revolution." A petition to the Crown was offered praying that the offices of the province might be placed in the hands of Protestants, who constituted its people. It was right and just, on the Calverts' own principles, that this should be done. Nor did their descendants and successors strongly oppose it.

¹ Shea, p. 75.

The first clear view of the Church's career there begins in 1675. A Mr. Yeo, of Patuxent, writes to the Archbishop of Canterbury,—

“The Province of Maryland is in a deplorable state for want of an established ministry. Here are ten or twelve counties, and in them at least twenty thousand souls, and but three Protestant ministers of the Church of England. The Lord's Day is profaned, religion is despised, and all the notorious vices are committed, so that it is become a Sodom of uncleanness and a pest of iniquity.”

The picture drawn by Mr. Yeo is probably too deeply colored, but there is abundant testimony that that pestilent class had multiplied rapidly which has since become the bane of the United States. “Bad Catholics” have always been the worst of the population,—while good ones have been as good as any. The only authority which they have been reared to recognize as really binding is the Church. When they or their children break away or lapse from under it, there is nothing to take its place. The intrinsically divine quality of civil government, which has always been one of the underlying beliefs of Protestantism, is unknown by them. In their eagerness to accent the divine nature of the Church, they have emptied everything else of its divinity. When they break with it they are left wandering stars. In the present day they form a great proportion of the inmates of jails and penitentiaries. In the last years of the seventeenth century they were at large in Maryland. The Roman Catholic Church had almost completely lost its hold on its own children. It was not for a hundred years later that they were able to support their first bishop. When Madison went to England for consecration, John Carroll, the Roman Catholic, was his shipmate on his way to accomplish a similar errand.

The lapsed Romanists were mingled with lapsed Churchmen, Quakers destitute of the "inner light," Baptists, and a few Scotch Presbyterians. They were practically all planters. The evil effect of African slavery upon the masters was beginning to show itself. They were overbearing, indolent, and licentious, — the three besetting sins of slave-keeping people. Dancing, drinking, horse-racing, cock-fighting, were their serious occupations.¹ Their charter was revoked in 1690, like those of Massachusetts and New York, in pursuance of the home policy which had determined to bring the colonial territory out of its anomalous political status, and restore it to its place as a part of the common possessions of the kingdom. By this act of the Crown, — not the colonists themselves, — the ecclesiastical balance was overturned. The people came back under English law. By that law the Romanist as such was proscribed: His very existence became treason. By the same law the English Church was part of the machinery of the realm. It needed no new statute for either. The existing laws sufficed. The Church of England was now the established Church of Maryland. Clergy began to come apace, but of a character and quality so indifferent that their presence wrought, if possible, more harm than their previous absence had done. It is evil for a people to have no priests; it is still worse to have bad ones. The first Maryland priest we catch sight of is of this sort. John Coode, a politician, Unworthy ministers. a mountebank, a land-surveyor, a Jack-of-all-trades, had been mixed up with all the broils of the colony, was always to be found at his post after the fight, when the spoil was being gathered. He had been most forward in the petition to have the colonial offices turned over to Protestants, and had secured two or three of them for his share. The duties of one of them called him to England. While there he managed to have himself ordained to the ministry. Upon his return he began at once to officiate. It can readily be imagined how much good he did. His character grew from bad to worse. Without giving up either his sacred or secular office he added to them both that of customs officer. At odd times he surveyed a plantation and bowsed all the evening with the owner. He was so drunk once during service on Sunday that Governor Nicholson, who was in the congregation, led him out and caned him handsomely, — and was challenged by him for the indignity. He went up and down the colony preaching on Sunday, and lecturing during the week, on “The Absurdities of Christianity,” — a sort of seventeenth-century Ingersoll in spurs and cassock. Finally his conduct became so intolerable that he was arrested, tried for general misbehavior, and banished from the colony.

¹ Lodge: English Colonies in America, p. 127 et seq.

¹ McMaster: History of People of United States, vol. i. pp. 424, 425.

It must not be supposed that all the priesthood were such as this, the first we meet. The earliest missionaries had been devout and godly men, and some such still remained. But for the most part they had passed away. Now that plantation life had grown easy, and a ready fortune was to be gathered, and the people themselves had declined in manners, so many of Coode's sort came that we shall find ministerial unworthiness to be a painful feature of the Church for more than a generation,—indeed, in the Southern colonies, quite up to the Revolution.

When the year 1700 had been reached, the position of the Church in the province of the Calverts was, roughly, this. There were about twenty-two thousand inhabitants, nine-tenths of them nominally Protestants, a turbulent and ill-regulated populace. The Church of England was established by law. A poll-tax of forty pounds of tobacco was assessed for its support upon every rate-payer. There were about half a dozen clergy. The people were in many places anxious both for more and better ones. They forwarded petitions to the Bishop of London and Canterbury frequently to this end. A curious fact is that the signers of these petitions constantly called themselves "Protestant-Catholics." Did they anticipate by two centuries a true conception of the Church? Were the two classes so fused together in the common population that they simply described themselves?

The Establishment was most unpopular, even in the eyes of the staunchest Churchmen. The tax of tobacco was evaded, or else paid in an herb of so poor a quality that even Parson Samson raised his gorge at it.

The ecclesiastical history of the colony has been well summed up in the words of a modern writer :

“There were three eras of toleration in Maryland. That of the proprietaries, which lasted fifty years. Under it all believers in Christ were (theoretically) equal before the law, and all support to churches and ministers was voluntary.

“That of the Puritans, which lasted six years, and included all but Romanists, Episcopalians, and heretics.

“The Anglican toleration, which lasted eighty years, had glebes and churches for the Establishment, connivance for Dissenters, penal laws for Catholics, and from all the forty pounds per poll.”¹

¹ American Commonwealth Series, Maryland, p. 186.

CHAPTER V.

THE DUTCH.

THE early settlements were established, one after the other, on the banks of Albemarle Sound, Chesapeake, Massachusetts, New York, and Delaware Bays. To the three first and the last the colonists came impelled either entirely or dominantly by religious motives, and all came from England. The New York settlement sprang from religious motives only indirectly. Remotely, the Reformation was its occasion. That had divided Europe into two hostile camps. For half a century they strove to settle on the field that quarrel between the Pope and the Augustinian monk, which had failed of adjustment by argument. Slowly the war concentrated itself into the Netherlands, the historic battle-ground of Europe. In that arena Rome broke herself against the indomitable Dutch. But these could strike, as well as endure. While they stubbornly defended themselves at home, they aimed a blow at their Spanish enemy's remotest border. The English skipper, Henry Hudson, with a Seeking the East Indies. sturdy Dutch crew in the ship Half Moon, was sent to ravage the Spanish possessions in the Farther Indies. In September, 1609, they passed inside Sandy Hook, and fancied they might before evening drop their anchor in front of Singapore.¹ The great river they were in, and the Straits of Malacca, to their minds, covered the same space upon the map. An unsuspected continent and an unknown ocean lay between them and their purpose. Their voyage of war became changed perforce to one of discovery and adventure; for trading with Indians would be quite as profitable as fighting with Lascars. Bears and wolverines were plenty on either side of Hudson's River, mink and otter abundant along the Sound, and muskrats swarmed about the Haarlem flats. Barter with the natives was easy, and Hudson's crew went home both earlier and richer than they had expected. Their report soon led to other expeditions for the same purpose. A fort and a cluster of cabins sprang up on Manhattan Island. In 1619 the United Provinces gained their hard-won independence. Immediately there sprang up among them the same movement of adventure and colonization which had shown itself among the English upon their peace with Spain. The "Dutch West India Company" was organized. The United Provinces gave it leave to found a state in America. Leave was all they gave it. They warned the colonists that they went on their own responsibility, and took their own risk. They must "look to the Provinces for nothing but friendly patronage." In 1625 the advance guard of thirty families came. For twenty-four dollars they bought Manhattan Island for their own, and began at once to build their town about the block-house of the fur-traders.

¹ Parkman: Discovery of the Great West, p. xxi.

It is their ecclesiastical future with which we have to do. After two centuries and a half shall have passed over, we will find the names borne by these Dutch immigrants in the Church, — Stuyvesants, De Ecclesiastical position of the Dutch. Peysters, Livingstons, Schuylers, Bleeckers, and Remsens. By what steps, and through what influences, have they come?

They came here Presbyterians, but Presbyterians of a very different type, and with other traditions, than those we shall find across the Church's path later on. In their long war with the Papacy their bishops had taken sides against them. When the Episcopate runs away, only the Presbyterate is left. The Dutchmen's theory of the Presbytery came after the fact. In such a case the theory is not held aggressively. Their theology was not of the fierce Calvinistic sort. It was broader, more kindly, and more human. The "Church idea" has never been wanting in them or their descendants. They had become Presbyterian from necessity, and continued to be so from wont and use rather than from conscience. Five years after their town of New Amsterdam was started, their first minister came out.

The Dutch as settlers. Fifty communicants and more greeted him. The colony grew rapidly. Soon the island was too strait for them, and they pushed out to search new places. They ascended the Hudson, and followed the Mohawk till its branches interlaced with the Susquehanna. Adrian Block passed through the Sound, and left his name on Block Island. Captain May followed the Jersey coast till he reached the cape which bears his name. They plodded eastward until they confronted the Puritans on the Housatonic. This was a significant meeting. It was the old problem in physics of an irresistible body meeting an immovable one. It was followed by a whole generation of contest, sometimes by words, then by threats, and even by blows. Roger Williams came all the way from Providence to arbitrate between them, and gained the ill-will of both.

The Dutch had learned religious toleration in a hard school, and had learned their lesson well. In New York alone, of all the colonies, absolute religious Toleration. liberty subsisted from the start. Even in Penn's colony no "Jew, Turk, Infidel, or heretic" might live. New York gave a home to everything that is human. There the Jew first set foot in America. Lutherans, Puritans, Presbyterians, Huguenots, and Quakers dwelt undisturbed. Even when choleric old Peter Stuyvesant harried the Quakers and Lutherans, it was to satisfy a personal grudge, and his conduct was not sustained by the people. Dutch, French, and English were spoken, each by so many that public documents required to be in all three tongues.

But this prosperous Dutch colony was occupying British soil, and now their place was wanted. They had come without leave asked, and had been warned by their own government, in advance, not to look to it for help. The mouth of the Hudson was within the Virginia Company's grant. That company had resigned to the Crown what was needed for Massachusetts and Maryland, but not for New Netherlands. It was now wanted for the King's brother, the Duke of York. The Dutch were warned to vacate, but placidly sat still. On the 8th of September, 1664, the Duke's fleet, with

Colonel Nichols, dropped anchor off the island. Stout Peter Stuyvesant, then governor, stormed in vain. The Dutch would not fight, neither would they run away. They went about their work serenely. Their governor ungraciously capitulated for them, stipulating that "the Dutch shall enjoy liberty of conscience here in divine worship and church discipline."¹

Colonel Nichols landed with his staff and his chaplain, bringing the English flag and the English Church.

Coming of the English
Church.
Their coming did not strikingly change the ecclesiastical situation. Colonel Nichols was himself a Churchman, but of a mild type.

He made no attempt at propagandism. His own chaplain read prayers and preached in the little log chapel of Fort James alternately with the Dutch dominie, and, later on, the Roman Catholic priest. For thirty years this indifference continued. The Dutch had their meeting-houses; the Huguenots had their chapel; the Baptists had theirs; and the Quakers met from house to house; but the Church's voice was not heard beyond the garrison's drum-beat. When Governor Andros came the situation changed. His truculent Churchmanship asserted itself here as it had done in Boston. He found, however, that the Dutch were more difficult to deal with than even the Puritans. They would not actively oppose his projects, much less fly into a religious fury, but their stolid inertia baffled even the domineering governor. He passed away soon to another province, leaving the Church circumscribed as narrowly as it had been before he came, but bearing now the burden of popular dislike which he had created.

¹ Capitulation: Article viii.

It was not till 1690, after the Dutch Stadtholder had become the English King, that the Church began to grow. The change of dynasty had its effect. The Dutch in New York no longer deemed themselves foreigners. The King spoke their tongue far better than he did English. He was a member of their Church as well as an Episcopalian. If their beloved Prince of Orange found it easy to be a Churchman, why should not they do likewise? Even if they did not become so formally, their feeling toward the Church became greatly modified. The only thing they boggled at was giving up their beloved Dutch tongue. They stood out against this, but in vain. The young people understood English, and grew to dislike their fathers' speech. They clamored for English in their services. When the elder people refused to allow it, the younger turned to the Church.

In 1692 Governor Fletcher persuaded the Assembly to pass an "Act to make provision for the ministry in every county." It districted the province into parishes, provided for an assessment to sustain public worship, and put it within the governor's right to nominate "a worthy Protestant minister" in each. It is clear that the Assembly used the term "Protestant minister" in its widest sense. They were themselves almost all Dutch Presbyterians. But the governor declared that he was constrained to interpret the Act in accordance with the law of the realm. Wherever that law met the phrase "Protestant minister," it understood by it a minister of the Established Church. If the Assembly meant something else, they should have said what they meant. They had used the legal phraseology, and by it they had unintentionally established the Church of England in New York! He would nominate none but Churchmen to the parishes, and the tax must be expended for them. It seems at this distance like sharp practice. In Massachusetts it would have brought such a storm about the governor's ears as would have swept him off the coast. But the Dutch do not seem to have very seriously resented it. The truth was, it was rather a barren victory for the Church. The Assembly had the machinery for taxation in their own hands, and they would not be likely to set it going under the circumstances. The governor nominated a rector or two in Long Island, but no salary was forthcoming, and the appointees could not live in these parishes. But the Act, and the governor's interpretation of it, placed the Church legally in possession. It fenced all others out.

Church establishment.

When the English-speaking Presbyterians, immediately afterward, organized their first society, they found they could not take title to the land where they wished to build their church. But the General Assembly of the (Established) Presbyterian Church of Scotland came to their relief. A committee of that body, a corporation known to the laws of the realm, held their title for them, and they went on with their building.

While the Presbyterians were thus trying to start their society, and the phlegmatic Dutch were seemingly indifferent to the whole matter, the Rev. Mr. Miller, the chaplain of the fort, elaborated a scheme for the Church's good, which, if it had been carried out, would have changed the future ecclesiastical history of America. His plan was to have a Bishop sent out. He proposed that the Bishop of London should consecrate a suffragan for New York. There was nothing to hinder. The province was a Crown colony. The Church was now established. The Bishop of London was its Ordinary. He could not look after it himself. Why not appoint a suffragan? Miller's plan was, as he states, "to use the King's Farm, at present a very ordinary thing, yet will admit of considerable improvement," for the Bishop's seat; that a subscription be started to put the farm in order, and to build a Bishop's Church; that the large sums of money now raised in England for missionary purposes be administered by the Bishop of New York; that "five or six sober young ministers be brought over with Bibles and Prayer-Books and other things convenient for Churches, so that the Bishop with these powers, qualifications, and supplies, would in a short time, through God's assistance, be able to make great progress in the settlement, and in the correction of vice." The plan was in every way feasible, and is almost the only one of all the plans for the Episcopate which was so. At this time there would have been no difficulty in the way. The Dutch would not have opposed it, and it is hardly too much to say that they would have welcomed it. Twenty-five years later it would have been impossible in any of the colonies. By that time the idea of an ultimate separation from the mother country had found a lodgement. No institution not already here, which might seem to knit the bonds more tightly, would be tolerated. In 1695 this was not the case. Loyalty was then universal, and dissent was only in its second generation. It had not gained the strength of prescription. What really did stand in the way of this and every other attempt to secure the Episcopate here was the extensive and minute ignorance which obtained among English Churchmen concerning colonial affairs. The idea of a Bishop in the American wilderness was as grotesque to them as now would be the suggestion of a professor of the higher mathematics among the Zulus. It was not till fifty years later that Berkeley saw the star of empire westward take its way. And vision as clear as his was just about as common as seers always are. Poor Chaplain Miller's well-digested plan was not even considered. It was not possible a second time for a whole century.

Plan for the Episcopate.

Meanwhile the Church people of New York drew together and organized Trinity Parish in 1697. The Trinity Church. Church made all the freeholders of the town electors to choose wardens and vestrymen; made the Bishop of London rector at a salary of one hundred pounds a year; the salary was to be raised by assessment upon real estate; the new church was to be, as the royal representative phrased it, "our sole and only parish church and churchyard in this our said City of New York."

The Church was built, and is described as "standing very pleasantly on the banks of Hudson River, and has a large cemetery on each side, and is enclosed in front by a painted paled fence. Its revenue is restricted by Act of Assembly to five hundred pounds, but it is possessed of a farm at the north end of the city, which is lately rented, and will in the course of a few years, it is hoped, produce a considerable income."

The hope seems to have been well founded.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SOUTH RIVER.

THE Hudson was the "North River," the Delaware the "South River." To find the colonists for this last, we must cross to the continent as we did for the Hudson. We will bring settlers of a foreign speech, but of a church akin to the English.

When the great Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, laid down his life on the field of Lutzen, his great chancellor, Oxenstiern, took up his master's task
The Swedes. as best he might. He cast about to find where his reformed Swedes might be safe from their ancient enemy. Like the other leaders of his time, his thoughts turned to America. Under the chancellor's patronage, Peter Minuit organized his little colony, and landed with them at Wilmington, 1637. They were Lutheran Episcopalians. Sweden had been fortunate enough to come out of the storm of her reformation with her Hierarchy standing; somewhat damaged, to be sure, but sufficiently secure to gain recognition. The Minister who came with the Swedish colony, and his brethren who followed him, had all been episcopally ordained. They had a history, a liturgy, a church life. When they came in contact with the English Church at Philadelphia and Wilmington, they coalesced with it without any questions asked on either hand.¹ But they did not meet with friendly Englishmen. Their nearest neighbors were the Dutch on the Hudson and in the Jerseys. These were a sturdy, thrifty people, who knew good land when they saw it. They had no notion of allowing the Swedes to intrude. That they themselves had no rights, did not affect the question. They had possession. Frequent expeditions were sent out from New Amsterdam to drive the Swedes away from the Delaware. These expeditions were badly managed, and in fact the old soldiers of Gustavus were more than a match for the fur-traders of the Hudson. They held their own and increased until sturdy Peter Stuyvesant undertook the task of conquest. But the Dutch victory was short-lived. Hardly had Stuyvesant returned victorious when Colonel Nichols with the English fleet appeared in the East River, and the Dutch and Swedes both lost their titles. New Netherlands and by the English. New Sweden both passed back without a struggle under the British crown. A few recruits continued to come to the lower counties, but not enough to leave permanently any trace of their speech, their church, or their habits, in the New World. Their few parishes, at Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Chester, passed gradually into the Church of England, and were absorbed. Two or three quaint old churches, always known locally as the "Old Swedes," are all that survive. A hundred and fifty years later the Swedish Episcopacy came in sight

Absorption

¹ Perry: History of the American Episcopal Church, vol. i. p. 229.
Perry: Historical Collections: vol. Pennsylvania, p. 432.

again, in connection with the visit of America's first Bishops to England for consecration, but by that time the two churches, once neighbors, and well acquainted, had drifted so far apart that the Swedes' offer of the bishopric was hardly considered.¹

The real settlers of the Delaware were preparing in another quarter. In 1640, George Fox, the son of George Fox. a Leicestershire weaver, was herding sheep for a neighboring farmer. In his solitude he dreamed dreams and saw visions. It was an age of the fiercest theological controversy. For three generations Englishmen had thought and spoken of hardly anything else. All social, political, economical questions were religious ones at bottom. The common people were, and had long been, perplexed and ill at ease. The religious atmosphere was stormy. Men had lost their leaders. In the old days the yokel had not disturbed himself about his soul. That was the priest's business; he was paid for it. But now everything was changed. The old priests were gone, and the new ones were somewhat puzzling. They would give absolution — at a pinch — but they would not warrant it. They would hear confessions, but the penances they imposed were of a new-fangled kind, involving doctrines and experiences which were strange. At church the common man did not know very well how to behave. In one parish he seemed to see the old mass, in another he heard a preacher hold forth in language not clearly intelligible. He heard his neighbors discussing theology continually. Every man had a psalm or a doctrine.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury.

Salvation was no longer the simple thing it had once seemed to be. It could no longer be bought, delivered, and paid for, as it could in the good old days of the grandfathers. What the common people craved was a simple, portable evangel; something which was not mixed up with Spanish marriages, logical tournaments, abstruse doctrines, political policies. Whoever would discover such would be accounted a benefactor.

Fox turned his dreamy eyes within, and found God. The Spirit of God bearing witness with his spirit, — that was the substance of religion. To find the truth, one needs only to commune with his own heart and be still. This "Inner Light" was not only the final but the sole guide which it is safe to follow. It is the simplest of all ideas. It at a single stroke renders superfluous all the machinery of the Church. Why turn to doctor or council, to priest or preacher, if one can look within and see the Holy Ghost? He needed not to be instructed of any man.

It was natural that Fox's idea should be caught up. Indeed, it was in the air already, and had been for half a century. The Mystics, Mennonites, Anabaptists, Baptists, and "Fifth Monarchy" men in England had all held by it. But it was Fox's strength that he set out the idea in its naked simplicity. All before him had entangled it with questions of social freedom, ecclesiastical organization, fantastic ritual, and what not. Fox held it up in its sheer nakedness. The common people seized upon it as hungry men do bread. It swept over England like a craze. The lanes and hedges were filled with the preachers of the New Light. They declared that when the light shone within them they did "exceedingly fear and quake," — and the ribald dubbed them "Quakers," at their word. At first they were merely religious enthusiasts, but they quickly became something more. One begins by breaking loose from religious ordinances ; it is but a step farther to find one's self beyond the regulations of the State and the family. They became fanatics of a very dangerous sort. All the powers of society were trained upon them to put them down. There seemed good reason for their suppression. Only two generations earlier the Bundschuh had waded in blood through Germany. The peasants' uprising in Elizabeth's day was not forgotten. These Quakers appeared to be setting out on the same path. Those others had also begun by claiming a Divine illumination, and had ended in lust, violence, and cruelty. The magistrates, the priests, the nobility, and the citizens joined hands for their extermination. Then persecution drove them mad. Under its stress they passed into that riotous phase which it is difficult to associate mentally with the restrained, russet-clad folk whom we know by their name. They were impelled by a consuming fire. They "bore their testimony" up and down the earth. One of them bearded the Grand Turk to his face : another tore his cap to rags before Cromwell as a testimony against him. They visited Scotland and Ireland, the West India Islands, and the North American Colonies ; they were imprisoned by the Inquisitor at Malta ; one brother visited Jerusalem and bore his testimony

Extravagance and repression.

against the superstition of the monks.¹ Naked women, smeared with soot and filth, stalked about the streets and into English churches and New England meeting-houses. They thrived upon persecution. They fairly broke into gaol and clamored to be hanged. The criminal law at the time was brutal at the best. Leprous gaols, in which the prisoner was left to starve, the stocks, the pillory, the lash at the cart's tail, the hangman with his searing iron and quartering knife, stood round about the violator of the law or the disturber of the peace. The Quaker was both, and he looked upon the pains which confronted him, not merely serenely but with exalted joy. What could be done with such men?

Efforts to suppress the Quakers.

The law of every land in Christendom was against them. But these laws could not be enforced effectively without a sustained savagery of which Anglo-Saxons have more than once shown themselves to be incapable. The attempt was made. Five thousand of them were in gaol at once.² They were threatened, mobbed, pelted, ducked, fined, imprisoned, banished, their ears were cropped, they were laid in the stocks, whipped from market town to market town, shut up in mad-houses, and finally hanged. In the end the persecution gradually ceased, and the Quakers' ill-regulated enthusiasm exhausted itself. But by this time they had become a marked people. They had begun by ignoring the constant fact that religion as a spirit cannot subsist disembodied. They had turned their backs upon the sacraments of Christ's appointment, and this violation of a law of God, which is also a law of human nature, revenged itself upon them by compelling them to elevate into sacraments a certain whimsical misuse of pronouns and a fantastic dress. They had also learned self-control. The Spirit no longer possessed them; they possessed it. They became the same self-contained, prudent, negatively good folk their few surviving descendants still are. They had earned and compelled that curious, half-contemptuous good-will which is still accorded to them.

¹ Rev. Henry Ferguson: in Church Review, January, 1889. (A most admirable article upon the Quaker episode in New England.)

² Rowntree: Quakers, Past and Present, p. 72.

Like all classes who were uncomfortable in Europe, they began to look to America. In 1673, Fox came himself to spy out the land. He made an extended tour of observation from Maine to South Carolina. In every colony, after he left Massachusetts, he found people who looked upon him as one sent of God. Some of them were refugees from England and the Barbadoes, and some were sporadic. After going up and down the coast, he went home and organized a colony of Friends, whose agents bought for them, for five thousand dollars, the western half of Southern Jersey. In 1675 the ship Griffith brought them out and landed them at Salem. To this new settlement Quakers flocked by scores and hundreds. They were left to organize the colony after their own fashion. Religious liberty was its corner-stone. They would persecute no man, they would not even defend themselves. "There," in Baneroff's words, "in 1681, met the first legislative assembly in the world, who said thee and thou to all men, and wore their hats in presence of beggar and king." Their little colony of Salem remained thriving quietly and developing its own peculiar life until it was brought into touch with the rest of the world by the coming of a larger immigration of the same folk under a leader whose name has become known on two continents.

Quakers in
New Jersey.

William Penn is one of the most striking and picturesque figures in history. His father was a choleric English admiral, and his mother a gentle German mystic. When their son was a lad of sixteen, a student at Oxford, he chanced to hear the wandering Quaker preacher Loe, and saw the "Inner Light." His tutors and spiritual pastors and masters labored in vain to withdraw him from the sect with which he cast in his lot, but the enthusiasm was in his blood from his mother. When they could not prevail, they sent him home to his father. The admiral stormed at him, coaxed him, reasoned with him, beat him, but the gentle lad stood firm. Then his father sent him abroad, thinking that change of scene would cure him. He furnished him with letters to the gayest and most fashionable people, thinking to distract him. Penn went to the Continent a dreaming Quaker lad, and returned an accomplished Quaker gentleman. He lived long at the French court, and learned manners in the society to which his renowned father's letters gained him admission. He studied at a Swiss university, and learned the theology of Calvin. He lived with the Menmonites on the Rhine, and found them of his spiritual kin. He returned to England a courtier, a theologian, a philosopher, the master of three living languages and two dead ones, a graceful leader of the minuet, the most expert small-swordsman in Europe, and a Quaker still. He inherited his grandfather's great fortune, and won the friendship of the dissolute King. Thenceforth he devoted his life and wealth to the fortunes of his co-religionists, and won thereby, as he richly merited, both fame and wealth. A part of his inheritance was a claim against the Crown for sixteen thousand pounds. It was regarded as the poorest of assets, but Penn was willing to take his pay in that which cost the King nothing but his signature. In quittance of his claim he secured Pennsylvania. Both parties were well pleased, the King to have his cancelled bond, and Penn to have a new land for his people. In 1681 Penn brought his large and well-equipped colony up the Delaware, passed Salem, where their friends had preceded them, and began Penn's colony. the settlement of Philadelphia. To his great good-fortune, he found his land occupied by Indians of a spirit similar to that of his own people. The Delawares had been harried and beaten by their fierce northern neighbors, the Iroquois, till they were in no fighting mood. His own good-will and fair spirit gave them confidence, and led to that honorable treaty under the elm tree on the bank of Shackamaxon Creek. Penn's colony was spared the chapter of privation and want which all the others had passed through. It was strong from the start, and recruits came every month. The "New Light" had been spreading rapidly. There were fifty thousand Quakers in England alone.¹ In Wales their meetings were springing up on every hand.

¹ Rowntree: Quakerism, Past and Present, p. 72.

In Germany a multitude of kindred spirits had learned to know Penn.¹ From all these sources immigrants came pouring in.

It was meant to be for all time a Quaker State, but the names of its founders are now to be looked for upon the Communicants' lists of the Church. The descendants of Penn and Jennings and Shippen, of the Welsh Evans and Roberts, are now Episcopalians. The sect ceased long ago to be a power in America. It never made any converts in this country. When it had received the last of the immigrants who had become Quakers over the sea, its growth ceased, and long before that time it had begun to lose. The reason why is plain. Its fundamental tenet was false. This central error had become incased in a setting of customs and forms which has survived with great tenacity, but has had no power of propagation.

Why those who freed themselves from Quakerism should, as a rule, have come into the Church, is not at first sight so plain. It has not been the forms or the doctrines of the Church which has drawn them, but its spirit. The self-contained righteousness of life, the distrust of enthusiasm, the decency and propriety which have always been the Church's marks, have constituted the magnet. The Quaker, turned Churchman, has made a marked change outwardly, but it has not been accompanied by any wrench of the inner spirit. For this cause the gradual disintegration of that sect has been a constant source of gain to the Church. It began by a quarrel among the Quakers themselves. The Salem colony employed a Scotch Presbyterian, George Keith, a graduate of the University of Aberdeen, in the capacity of land-surveyor. It was his first acquaintance with the Friends. He became deeply interested in them and their peculiar doctrine and customs. Presently he saw the "Inner Light" himself, and became one of them. He was a valuable recruit. He was, to begin with, an educated man, and they had few such. He was, besides, a born controversialist and pamphleteer. He set their vague thoughts to words. He challenged their opponents to debate, and became their dexterous champion. His pamphlets and tracts were eagerly welcomed, not only by the Jersey Quakers, but by the more important society in Philadelphia. The Philadelphians invited him to come to them, as head master of their school. He quickly became their leading man, their David against the Philistines. But presently there began to be whisperings that their champion was not sound in the faith. He began to intimate that, while the "Inner Light" was necessary, it needed something besides itself. The "candle should have a candlestick;" "the spirit must needs have a body." This heresy struck at the root of Fox's simple system, and the Quaker instinct quickly discovered the fact. A period of controversy within the Society ensued. Keith had many friends and followers, and was far more than a match for his opponents in argument. Finally the "Yearly Meeting" passed a formal condemnation upon him. He issued a Vindication, for the publishing of which William Bradford, printer, was sent to jail by the Quakers in their magisterial capacity. Keith accepted his expulsion, and set up a separate Meeting, where he drew a large following. An acrimonious controversy followed, which convulsed the settlement and arrayed friend against friend.¹ While it raged Keith went to England upon private business. While there he took occasion to re-examine the whole question in a broader spirit, and was led to the Church of England, in which he took orders. We shall presently see him return as her first missionary.

Quakers coming to the Church.

¹ Graham: Colonial History of United States, vol. i. p. 548.

There was a provision in the terms of Penn's grant to the effect that if ever twenty people in the colony should petition therefor, they should have the right to organize a Church of England parish, and apply to the Bishop of London for a minister. In 1695 such a petition was circulated, signed, among others, by several hundred of the "Keithian Quakers." The Quakers raged furiously against it—(if Quakers can rage furiously),—and the magistrates had the attorney who drew up the petition arrested, together with several of the signers. Their action was, however, so evidently without law, that nothing beyond annoyance and ill-will came of it. By this time the Quakers had been so overslaughed by other immigration that, taking the whole colony together, they constituted less than one-third the population. Among these others the majority were nominally Church of England people. About this time services of the Church began to be held in Philadelphia. Neither the time nor the place of the first Common-Prayer worship can now be known. The Rev. Mr. Sewell of Maryland is the first clergyman who comes in sight. He visited Philadelphia from time to time, and held occasional services for the Church folk. The original place of worship is described as "a wooden shed, with a bell swung in the crutch of a tree near by." By 1700 Christ Church had been organized, a brick church costing six hundred pounds had been built, and the Rev. Thomas Clayton, the first incumbent, had taken charge. The town was still strongly under the domination of Quakerism, but the Keithians were ready to come into the Church. In the first few years of the parish more than five hundred of them were baptized. The growth was more rapid, Increase and spread. however, in the outlying settlements than it was at the centre. Especially did it gain ground among the Welsh, whose seat was west of the Schuylkill. In 1700 there were missions planted at Radnor, Concord, Chester, and Perkiomen. These became the nuclei for the scattered Church families in the back settlements, and the Church grew apace in Penn's colony.

¹ The documents with which the parties assailed one another are, for the most part, preserved in William Bradford's Publications, in the Pennsylvania Historical Society's rooms, and are curious reading.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CAROLINAS.

THE first church in South Carolina was built the same year that Penn's colony landed on the Delaware. The life of that colony had been feeble and turbulent. The Gentleman's Magazine for 1740 gives a curious but apocryphal account of the planting of the Church among the palmettos. The story is, that on Good Friday, 1660, two ships laden with English adventurers landed at Port Royal. The company piled their goods on the beach, and the ships which had brought them sailed away home. The adventurers, ignorant alike of woodcraft and husbandry, when a few months had passed, found themselves starving. They were fortunate in having a brave chaplain, Morgan Jones, a Welshman. In their extremity he offered, with a few Indians and Welsh. others, to make the perilous journey in search of Raleigh's colony on the Roanoke, — of whose destruction they were ignorant, — to gain succor for the rest. After many days' journey the little band were taken prisoners by the Tuscaroras. They were bound to the stake, and the savages stood about impatient to begin the torture. In his dire extremity Jones returned unconsciously to his mother tongue, and muttered his prayers in Welsh. To his amazement, he found that "the salvages did right well understand his speech." The captives' bonds were cut and they were respited from immediate torture, but detained as captives. Jones continued to teach the Indians in Welsh, and so gained their good-will that he and his companions were set free, and by some means found their way north. In 1680 this same Morgan Jones was officiating at Newtown, L.I.¹

The real settlement of the Carolinas was not until 1670. A company had been formed which included the Lord Chancellor, Shaftesbury, Albemarle, Berkeley, The "noble" Ashley, and Carteret. The colony which colony. they sent out settled at "Charles's town." This was a "Crown Colony," and had no religious motive. It was purely commercial. Of course, as being an integral part of the kingdom, the Church was, in a certain vague way, established. But in the fierce struggle with nature, which is the first task of a colony, religious differences are not much emphasized, unless the company settling should have been moved by religious motives in their migration. The character of the founders of this colony was not such as to lead them to take much interest in such questions. A few men of noble birth, though questionable manners, were among them, but the majority were adventurers and broken men. By the time the colony had reached a population of five thousand, the Bishop of London sent his Commissary to organize the Church. He reports: "I never repented of anything, my sins excepted, as my coming to this place. The people here are the vilest race of men upon the earth. They have neither honor, honesty, nor religion, — being a perfect hotch-potch made up of bankrupt pirates, decayed libertines, sectaries, and enthusiasts of all sorts, who have transported themselves here from Bermudas, Jamaica, Barbadoes, New England, and Pennsylvania, and are the most factious and seditious people in the whole world. Many of those who pretend to be Churchmen are strangely crippled in their goings between the Church and Presbytery, and, as they are of large and loose principles, so they live and act accordingly, sometimes going openly with the Dissenters, as they do now against the Church, and giving incredible trouble to the government and clergy.”

¹ This curious belief in the identity of the Welsh and Indian tongues crops up repeatedly in the accounts of the early settlements, and at points most remote from each other.

In the inevitable quarrel between the people and the proprietaries, the Church of England in South Carolina sided against the people, and the Presbyterians with them. This will account for “their crippled goings between the Church and Presbytery.” The Church gained ground slowly, if at all. At the outbreak of the Revolution, nearly a century later, there was only the one parish which had been organized in 1682. It was not until well along in the nineteenth century that substantial growth began.¹ At the opening of the eighteenth century there was in Charleston “a large and stately church of cypress logs, on a brick foundation, surrounded by white palisades,” and named St. Philip’s. An act of the Colonial Assembly of 1698 named Samuel Marshall its incumbent; ap-

The establishment.

¹ Graham: Colonial History of U.S., vol. i. p. 339.

propriated to him and his successors forever a salary of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum, to be raised by assessment; and ordered that "a negro man and woman and four cows and calves be purchased at the public charge, for his use."

CHAPTER VIII.

A GENERAL SURVEY.

WE have now seen the stage set and the actors appear. With the single exception of Georgia the colonies are now all established. We have seen who their settlers are, whence they came, why they came, and how they bore themselves religiously in the early days. We have brought English Churchmen to the James, English Puritans to Massachusetts Bay, Dutch Presbyterians to the Hudson, English Romanists to the Potomac, Swedish Churchmen and English Quakers to the Delaware, and a congeries of English-speaking adventurers, under noble patronage, to the Carolinas. We have seen the diverse problems presented to the Church of England in the presence of peoples so unlike. In one place, its task was to retain its original establishment; in another, to gain a foothold in the midst of a hostile community; in another, to march with an equal step among its rivals in a free field. The end of the first century of its life in America will be a fitting place to pause and take a broad survey of its situation, to count its gains and losses, to observe its manner of life, to examine the people among whom it is to do its work in the years to follow, to test its spirit and its methods.

The great bulk of the Church in 1700 was in Virginia and Maryland. Forty of the less than threescore clergy scattered from Portsmouth to Charleston were in these two colonies. There were in them two or three comfortable churches, built of imported brick. In every settlement was a church of logs, with puncheon floors and clapboard roof. The population was purely agricultural and widely scattered. To these little log chapels the people came, on horseback and in canoes, from twenty, thirty, and forty miles away.¹ They often left their distant plantations on the Saturday and spent the night with their hospitable friends who lived nearer the place of worship. Never more than one service was held on the Sunday. The afternoon was needed for the congregation to return to their far-away homes. Prayer-Books were scarce and costly.² As late as the middle of the century only two editions had been printed in England beside the ponderous folios and quartos for the reading-desks. Of the smaller Prayer-Books very few found their way to the colonies, and were but ill adapted to the worshippers' use, at best. The arrangement of the services in them was so intricate as hardly to be intelligible. The Clerk, therefore, was depended upon for all the responses, except in the portions of the service which the people knew by heart. The surplice was very rarely used. Indeed, it is doubtful if there were then more than two or three in America.

In England the ordinary street dress of the clergy

¹ King's Handbook of Episcopal Churches, p. 13.

² Perry: History, vol. i. p. 475.

was the cassock.¹ In America this dress does not seem ever to have come into use. In public the minister officiated in the ordinary dress of a gentleman of corresponding standing. His social standing was very low indeed, independent of his personal character. Macaulay's highly colored picture of the English clergy of that time was fairly true of the Southern colonies. "A Levite," such was the phrase then in use, "might be had for his board and ten pounds a year: might not only perform his own professional functions, be the most patient of butts and listeners, be always ready in fine weather for bowls and in foul for shovel-board, but might also save the expense of a gardener or a groom. Sometimes the reverend man nailed up the apricots; sometimes he curried the coach-horses. He was permitted to dine with the family, but was expected to content himself with the plainest fare. He might fill himself with the corned beef and carrots, but when the tarts and cheesecakes appeared he quitted the board and stood aloof till he was summoned to return thanks for the repast, from a great part of which he had been excluded. The attorney and the apothecary looked down with disdain upon the clergyman, and one of the lessons most earnestly inculcated on every girl of honorable family was to give no encouragement to a lover in Orders." Queen Elizabeth in her time, as head of the Church, had issued a special command that no clergyman should presume to espouse a servant-girl without the consent of her master or mistress. His children were brought up like the children of the peasantry. His boys followed the plough, and his daughters went out to service. Parson Sampson not only taught George and Harry Esmond their letters, but acted as overseer of their mother's negroes. A large proportion of the Southern clergy were adventurers, broken men, valets who had secured ordination from some complaisant Bishop through the interest of their masters for whom they had done some questionable favor. A constant complaint was, also, that they were Scotchmen. Their letters of Orders were often suspicious,¹ and their characters still more so. Commissaries Blair of Virginia and Bray of Maryland repeatedly reported to the Bishop of London that the meagre support of the clergy, and the slight honor in which they were held prevented them from making honorable marriages and led them into disgraceful connections. A love-letter still survives written by a Maryland clergyman to a planter's daughter, in which he argues at length that inasmuch as his suit was allowable on other grounds, the fact of his being in Orders ought not to be an insuperable barrier.² They provoked contempt and allowed themselves to be treated like lackeys. Governor Nicholson led out one who was drunk in the church, and caned him soundly with his own hand; clapped the hat over the eyes of another; and sent billets-doux to his mistress by a third.³ He hectorcd and browbeat a whole Convocation and drove them to sign an adulatory testimonial to his own religious devoutness. Commissary Blair writes: "The governor rules us as if we were a company of galley slaves, by continual raving and thundering, cursing and swearing, base, abusive, Billingsgate language, to that degree that it is utterly incredible."¹ One commissary was given the lie in his own house by the governor;² and the wife of another was pulled out of Lady Berkeley's pew by the wrist because her husband had offended its owner by "preaching a little too home against adultery."³ There were always present in these colonies some clergy of exemplary life and high character, but neither their example nor their reproofs were able to redeem their brethren. Most of them were planters, and did priestly duty now and then to eke out their income. They hunted, played cards, drank punch and canary, turned marriages, christenings, and funerals alike into revels. One bawled out to his church-warden at the Holy Communion, "Here, George, this bread is not fit for a dog." One fought a duel in his graveyard. Another, a powerful fellow, thrashed his vestrymen one by one, and the following Sunday preached before them from the text, "And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair."⁴ Another dined every Sunday with his chief parishioner, and was sent home in the evening drunk, tied in his chaise.⁵

¹ Personal Recollections of Gilbert Scott, p. 28.

¹ The Episcopal Church was suppressed in Scotland; Scotch Orders doubted, and afterward declared null and void by England. Abbey: English Church and its Bishops in the Eighteenth Century, vol. ii. p. 179, et seq.

² Lodge: History of English Colonies in America, p. 90.

³ Ibid., p. 61.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Virginia, pp. 125, 491.

² Ib. p. 491.

³ Ib. p. 27.

⁴ Neh. xiii. 29.

⁵ Cf. Meade: Old Churches and Families of Virginia, pp. 18, 162, 231, 250, 275.

In the Northern colonies both the character and the standing of the clergy were very much higher. In these colonies there had never been anything to attract unworthy men. The duty was hard and ill paid, and only men who had high motives undertook it. In the South the disreputable priest might gain fortune as a tobacco-planter. In the North the conditions of life were harder. There also he was surrounded by a people whose religious life, at least in the early part of the century, was exacting. There was no establishment to sustain him. But, above all, the Puritan conception of the ministerial office had early made itself felt. While the priest in Virginia was content to be a lackey, the Puritan minister in Massachusetts was a petty potentate, the chiefest man in the community, the censor of morals, the stern disciplinarian. In the Church the office was generally looked upon as a profession. Outside it was regarded as a spiritual calling. In England the position and accomplishments of the "superior clergy" were sufficient to keep for the office generally a certain respect. But the mass of the clergy were then held in anything but honor. A debt which the Church owes to Puritanism on both sides of the water is the restored reputation of the ministry. The popular mind never distinguishes closely between things which look alike. To it a clergyman is a clergyman, whether Episcopal or Presbyterian hands have been laid upon him. The ministry with which people were most familiar in the colonies was irregular in its commission, but held in high honor by those among whom it was exercised. For this reason the ministry of the Church, beginning with New England in the seventeenth century, and extending all over the country in the eighteenth, came to share that place in public esteem which has ever since been cheerfully accorded to the sacred office.

Effect of Puritanism upon clerical office.

In Maryland and Virginia the Church of England was established by law. It had privileges and immunities granted to no sect. Marriages could only be celebrated by its clergy. The glebes and perquisites were guaranteed to its use. Its services and clergy were supported by taxes to be laid and collected by process of law. Their brethren at the North envied their position, and looked to the time when they should be similarly blessed, but the event proved that what was deemed their strength was really their weakness.

In Virginia the right of presentation lay in the royal governor, as representing the Bishop of London, but the power of induction to the benefice was with the vestry. Being once inducted, however, the vestry's power over the incumbent was exhausted. They could not remove him from his benefice, and they could not starve him out, for his income was assured by law. From this arose that contest between the clergy and the vestries, which finally tore the Church to pieces. The vestries in many instances refused to induct whom the governor had nominated. There was no power able to issue a mandamus. The result was that clergymen were hired by them from year to year, and made to dance attendance upon their pleasure. The position was an ignoble one, and had attractions only for unworthy men. Presently, as the vestries came more and more under the American idea, and the clergy more and more emphatic in their loyalty to the English Church and Crown, the breach widened. By the middle of the century we will find it to be incurable. Sound Church notions of the relation of priest and people were completely thrown back and obscured by the political situation. When the clergy were only standing out for the inherent rights of their Order, they were placed in a position where they seemed to be the champions of a foreign political power. The union of English Church and State here, as always, worked to the Church's ruin. The true Church idea was almost entirely lost to sight by both sides. The same law, for example, which "established" the Church in South Carolina, provided for a board of laymen who could try and remove any minister against whom complaint should be made by a majority of the vestry, together with nine aggrieved parishioners.¹ The laity of the middle colonies were of much the same mind, but without the legal power to make it effective; but the difference between the two orders was, in kind, the same as in the South. A meeting of the clergy of New York and Pennsylvania formally resolved thenceforward to do without vestries altogether, but the vestries held their own, and have ever since been an effective part of the Church's machinery.

In New York and Massachusetts the Church had also a legal recognition at this date, which seemed to place it at an advantage. In so far as the colonies were under the English law, after the revocation of the original charters, the Episcopal Church was that one which the law knew here. The Church, in a certain sense, went with the flag. But the question of how far English law was modified or suspended by the new charters and by colonial legislation, was a mooted one.¹ Its manner of settlement, so far as the Church was concerned, inclined to either hand in proportion as the population was friendly to her or otherwise. Where it was unfriendly, every claim of prerogative by her produced irritation and opposition. In New England this was frequently the case. For many years the Church had not been allowed at all. When it came in with the new governor on the Rose frigate, it at once attached to itself all the obloquy which the new régime created. Its royal backing saved it alive, but guaranteed for it the ill-will of the community. Nevertheless, by 1700 the "King's Chapel" had been built in Boston, its minister settled, and a considerable congregation gathered. But it was an exotic in a foreign climate, a garrison surrounded by a hostile people.

¹ Perry: History, vol. i. p. 376.

To the eastward of Massachusetts there was but a single congregation. Gorges's ever faithful settlement on the Kennebec had, through all the years, held steadfastly to their Church and Prayer-Book. For this they had been beset and harried by the Massachusetts Puritans; had been kept out of the New England League, and left single-handed to defend themselves against the common savage enemy; their commerce had been destroyed, their minister stripped of property and almost life, and now, an old man, incapable of duty and in poverty, he waited to die.

Effect of government support.

The Church
in the East.

¹ Smith: History of New York. London, 1757, pp. 220-228.

To the westward there were a few Church families at the mouth of the Housatonic, and practically no more till New York was reached. In that town, In the middle colonies. with a population of about five thousand, Trinity Church had been built and endowed with a farm in the outskirts, had a minister and a claim to support by taxation. Accessions by immigration and by additions from the Dutch Presbyterians were numerous. The people were, upon the whole, not ill-disposed toward the Church. The whole province was, as we have seen, divided into parishes, and provision made for the support of the minister; but outside the capital there were no clergy, and, with the exception of a little group in the eastern part of Long Island, no Church people.

In Pennsylvania, Christ Church had been built at Philadelphia, and under its faithful rector, Evan Evans, was rapidly gaining ground, both in the city from the Quakers, and from the Welsh in the outlying settlements.

In a word, at the opening of the eighteenth century, the Church may be said to have been planted in all the colonies. In some places, as we will see, it brought forth much fruit. In others it was choked, and required replanting.

CHAPTER IX.

THE "VENERABLE SOCIETY."

THE Church is now lodged in the colonies, not as an organization, but in the shape of isolated congregations, widely separated, a minority in the population, linked to each other only through the Bishop of London, who had a shadowy power of superintendency over them all.

In the period which lies between the year 1700 and the War of Independence, the history groups itself about a half-dozen topics. These we will notice in their order. The first is the work of the "Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts."

In the closing years of the seventeenth century, the Rev. Dr. Bray was the successful rector of a parish in Warwickshire. He comes in sight as the Dr. Bray. first of the "working clergy." His spirit is distinctly modern. His methods strangely anticipated those of to-day. He was a "parish priest." He made himself familiar with the needs of his flock, and was fertile in devising plans for their benefit. Presently, he attracted the notice of his superiors, and was promoted. In his new office, he was oppressed with what he saw of the ignorance and general lack of equipment of the parish clergy. They could not feed their flocks, for they themselves were starving for lack of knowledge. Those among them who were best furnished with books had upon their shelves only the "Pearl of Eloquence, some German system, a few stitched sermons, with an old Geneva Bible and Concordance." Bray became their benefactor. He was one of those enthusiasts whose spirit is contagious. He interested his Bishop and other men and women of wealth and liberality, in the formation of a "Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge." Its first purpose was to found parish libraries for the benefit of the clergy and then of the people. By his efforts that society which now commands the pens of university examiners and tutors, and even of prime ministers, was set upon a strong foundation. In addition to its work at home it took up the added task to provide libraries for the churches in the colonies. Before Bray's death he saw more than forty such furnished to America alone.

In 1695, he was asked by Compton, Bishop of London, to visit and report upon the condition of the Church in the American Colonies. Compton's succession to the See of London was the best thing that had yet happened for the colonial churches. His sense of official responsibility for them was great. His predecessors had looked after their affairs a little, when it was convenient, but had not regarded themselves as legally responsible. Indeed, their shadowy jurisdiction was only the result of the accident that the then Bishop of London had been a member of the original "Virginia Company." At Compton's instance, the Bishop of London was formally put in charge of the colonies by an order in council.¹ Regarding them then as a part of his diocese, he sent Dr. Bray to investigate their situation. After an extended visit of five years, he returned and published his "Memorial upon the State of Religion in America." He reports¹ that Dr. Bray's "Memorial." in South Carolina the Church was thriving, but at least three more clergy were needed. In North Carolina there were two Church settlements, a hundred miles apart, and no clergyman in either of them. In Maryland the endowment was, as yet, very insufficient, but the people had built churches for themselves. The Pennsylvanians had one Church of England Minister, well esteemed, and wished for more. The Jerseys had as yet none, but he thought there would be reception for six. New York had one; there was room for at least two more. In Long Island there were nine churches (parishes), but no ministers. In Rhode Island the Quaker neglect for outward teaching had caused great irreligion. There was a church there, and room for at least two ministers. New England was under Independents.

¹ Abbey: The English Church and its Bishops in the Eighteenth Century, vol. i. p. 82

But Dr. Bray was not content with merely making his report. He had left his heart in America. He laid the case of the Church there before everybody whom he could reach. He printed pamphlets, wrote letters, conferred with the Bishops, appealed to Parliament, and engaged the warm interest of the Queen. Through his tireless exertion there was organized in 1701 the first Missionary Society of the Protestant world. Its title was "The Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts." Its charter ran :

The S. P. G.

¹ Abbey: i. p. 84.

"William the Third, King of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Greeting:

"Whereas we are informed that in many of our plantations and colonies beyond the sea, belonging to our Kingdom of England, the provision for ministers is very mean, whereby there is a great lack of the administration of the Word and Sacraments, causing atheism to abound for the want of learned and orthodox ministers, and Romish priests and Jesuits are encouraged to proselyte, . . . we therefore empower these, our right trusty subjects;"—then follow a hundred of the noblest names in England, with the Archbishop of Canterbury at the head, constituting the society. Its popularity was great from the outset. One member gave a thousand pounds for the work, another nine hundred for teaching the negroes. One gave to it his estate in the Barbadoes to found a college, and another a present of books and maps. Archbishop Tenison left it one thousand pounds towards founding two American bishoprics. The proprietors of Vermont set apart townships for its use. Evelyn enters in his diary that he had promised twenty pounds a year to it.¹ The society's actions were marked by good sense, good spirit, and broad-minded charity. Its first act was to circulate an "Address" to all bishops and archdeacons,² asking them to choose out fit persons for missionaries to the colonies and the Indians. The qualifications to be carefully noted in the persons recommended were: their age,

¹ Caswall: American Church, p. 130.

² "A collection of Papers printed by order of the S. P. G., London: printed by Joseph Downing in Bartholomew Close, near West Smithfield, 1712."

whether married or single, temper, prudence, learning, zeal, and loyalty to Church and Crown. The officials are solemnly adjured not to recommend any but fit men, and especially not to use the Society for the purpose of finding places for men whom they themselves wish to be rid of. "Standing Instructions"

Instructions to missionaries.

were issued to the applicants for appointment, that they shall not lodge at any public-house in London, but at some bookseller's or such private house; shall attend constantly the Standing Committee of the Society; that before embarking they shall wait upon his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury for his instructions; that when embarked they shall demean themselves so as to become remarkable examples of piety and virtue to the ship's company; that whether they be passengers or chaplains they shall endeavor to prevail with the captain to have morning and evening prayers, daily, with catechising on the Lord's Day; that during the passage they shall instruct, exhort, admonish, reprove, with seriousness and prudence, so as may gain them reputation and authority; that when they arrive in the country where they are sent they shall be frequent in private prayers, conversant with the Holy Scriptures, Prayer-Book, Articles, and Homilies; be circumspect; not board or lodge in public-houses; game not at all; converse not with lewd and profane persons, save to admonish them; be frugal; keep out of debt; not meddle with politics; keep away from quarrels; say the service every day, when practicable, and always with seriousness and decency; avoid high-flown sermons; preach against such vices as they may see to prevail; impress the nature and need of Sacraments; distribute the Society's tracts; visit their people, — in a word, bear themselves like Christians and gentlemen.

For salary they were to have fifty pounds a year, and ten pounds for outfit.

Among the many missionaries sent out by the Society, there were, of course, some who took to colonial work as a refuge from poverty or scandal,¹ but, as a rule, they made an impression at once by their high character and high Churchmanship. On this latter rock some of them split, but the general effect was to distinctly raise both the zeal and the tone of the Church in America.²

Their first missionaries were Keith, the whilom Philadelphia Quaker, and his friend Patrick Gordon. These came out in the ship Centurion, and on the voyage the ship's chaplain, John Talbot, determined to join them. Within a few weeks

First missionaries of the S. P. G.

of their landing Gordon died at Jamaica, Long Island. Keith and Talbot, under the Society's instructions, made a tour of observation extending from Boston to Charleston. Though they were very pronounced Churchmen, more so than most of the clergy at that time on this side of the water, they followed loyally the Society's desire that they should adopt a conciliating tone with dissenters everywhere. They were to preach in their meeting-houses whenever opportunity might offer, not to offend their prejudices unnecessarily, and where possible, win them back to the Church. There is every evidence of a widely spread inclination on the part of dissenters in America in the first half of the eighteenth century to return to the Church of England if the way could be made easy for them. It showed itself, as we will see later on (in connection with the story of the Episcopate), among Quakers, Lutherans, and Dutch, especially. The managers of the S. P. G. were men "having understanding of the times what things Israel ought to do." There is good reason to believe that if the Church had been here on the ground with a complete organization, the wise and conciliatory efforts of the Society's missionaries would have succeeded in healing at least some of those breaches in Zion, which have grown wider as the years have gone by.

¹ Anderson: English Church in the Colonies, vol. iii. p. 149.

² Abbey: English Church and Bishops, vol. i. p. 91.

Talbot writes from Philadelphia, September 1, 1703: "We have gathered together several hundreds for the Church of England, and, what is more, to build churches for her. There are four or five now going forward in this province and the next. That at Burlington is almost finished. Churches are going up amain where there were none before. They are going to build three at Carolina, and three more in these lower counties about New Castle, beside those at Chester and Amboy." The advent of the Society's missionaries gave an impulse to the Church's growth all along the line. But she lengthened her cords faster than she was able to strengthen her stakes. A considerable number of the newly built churches were never occupied at all, or at best for a short while, by the people for whom they had been erected. Clergy could not dissenters.

Conciliating

Building
churches.

be had in sufficient numbers to man them. The missionaries went upon their way to the southward, and the enthusiasm lagged. The new churches became "stables for the Quakers' horses when they came to meeting or market."¹ A circumference of enthusiasm followed Keith and Talbot where they journeyed, but for the most part subsided when they had passed on. In Philadelphia and its vicinity hundreds of Quakers were baptized by them, and in the southern counties they were welcomed in the Independents' meeting-houses, where they preached, and commended the Church to all who heard them. After a visit of two years Keith returned to England, and Talbot settled down as permanent incumbent at Burlington, N. J., where he spent a long and honored life.² From this time until the War of Independence the history of the Church in America is to be looked for in the records of the Venerable Society. More and more missionaries were sent out by it, and it undertook, in part at least, the support of the native ministry which gradually grew up. The letters of these missionaries to the secretary, written from the seaboard cities, the backwoods

¹ Anderson: iii. p. 238.

² It has been positively asserted that Talbot, when an old man, upon a visit to England, was consecrated to the Episcopate by the English nonjuring Bishops. Anderson, Hawks, Wilberforce, and Caswall all say so, apparently all following the same original authority, whatever that may be. The Rev. Dr. Hills, in his "History of the Church in Burlington," discusses the subject exhaustively, and maintains the same assertion. In vol. i. of Bishop Perry's "History of the American Episcopal Church" is a Monograph by Rev. Dr. John Fulton in which he re-examines the whole case, and arrives at the conclusion, which seems without doubt to be the truth, that Talbot never received such consecration; and that the tradition itself arose from confounding his name with that of another man.

settlements, the inland villages, the Indian encampments, and preserved in the Society's archives, constitute a vivid picture of the Church's life for seventy years.¹

¹ Bishop Perry has, with infinite pains, collected and published in fine folio volumes the Society's documents relating to the Colonial Church, under the title of "Historical Collections."

CHAPTER X.

THE COMMISSARIES : MARYLAND.

AT the same time that the Venerable Society sent out its first missionaries, the Bishop of London commissioned Dr. Bray, the promoter of the Society, to represent him in Maryland. He was empowered to assume the reins of the Church in the colony, to exercise discipline, to reform manners, to settle disputes, to preserve order, to build up the Church. His salary was fixed at four hundred pounds a year, — a liberal sum for the times, — all of which, together with his own patrimony, he expended on his work.

Upon his arrival in Lord Baltimore's former Roman Catholic province, he found that the Church of England contained, at least nominally, about eighty per cent of the population. The other twenty per cent embraced the insignificant remnant of Romanists, together with Baptists, Quakers, Huguenots, and German Lutherans from the Palatinate. There was a larger proportion of people ecclesiastically unattached than in any other colony save South Carolina. The decadence of Romanism, the negations of Quakerism, and the long lack of organization in the Church, had all conspired to multiply this class. Still, the Church of England was the dominating religious influence. The Commissary at first mistook the temper of the people.

Dr. Bray in Maryland.

Fresh from the Establishment at home, he undertook to introduce the same régime here. The disorders in doctrine and worship were evident. The way to cure them, as it seemed to him, was to secure by force of law the same uniformity in worship and discipline here which the State Church guaranteed in England. He found in Governor Nicholson a man who was of the same mind, ecclesiastically, with himself. He and the Governor persuaded the Provincial Assembly, apparently without difficulty, to pass an "Act of Uniformity," substantially the same as that which had obtained in Eng-establishment. land before the "Act of Toleration" made it tolerable. It provided not only that the Book of Common Prayer should be used in all the parishes of the Establishment, but also that it was "to be solemnly read by all and every minister or reader in every church or other place of public worship within this province."¹ A storm of opposition at once arose. The dissenters asked indignantly whether or not they were to be accounted as Englishmen; whether they were to be denied here in America that privilege of worshipping after their own fashion which had been allowed to their brethren in England for a generation. It was too late to protest against the Act in the colony, but their agents carried their grievances to the Crown, and, chiefly through the influence of the Quakers, succeeded in having the obnoxious clause vetoed in Privy Council.
Maryland

But the attempt to pass it had been a grave mistake. It failed, to be sure, but it gave the dissenters cause to distrust the Church's spirit. She seemed to them to be moved by a temper of gratuitous intolerance. It was all the more offensive because it was impotent. From being only indifferent to her, they passed into bitter enemies. The time came when they could make their enmity felt. But the law, as it still stood, put the Churchmen in possession.¹ Every minister presented by the governor, appointed, and inducted, received the "forty per poll," out of which he was to pay the clerk a fixed sum. Justices and magistrates were forbidden to perform the marriage ceremony, which was made the peculium of the Church of England clergy, at a fixed fee of "five shillings sterling and no more." The sheriff of the county was bound to collect the tobacco-tax for the minister. The incumbent was made ex officio a member of the vestry. The members of the vestries were bound to attend meetings under penalty. The care and repair of churches was provided for by a special tax, not to exceed ten pounds of tobacco for any one year. The dissenters were to be allowed to conduct worship as they saw fit, provided their places of meeting were certified to and registered at the county court.

¹ Hawks: Contributions, vol. ii. p. 98. Perry: History, vol. i. p. 143.

Having secured the legal status of the Church, the Commissary set about investigating the condition of the clergy and parishes. A Convocation, attended by fourteen of the clergy summoned, gave him the opportunity to address them with wisdom and earnestness upon their official conduct. A prolonged visitation which he undertook gave him the chance to see their manner of life. He found among them some devout and earnest men, but a still larger

Attempt to reform manners.

¹ Perry: History, vol. i. p. 143.

number who had fallen into the easy manners of the time and place, whose professional duties sat lightly upon them, and some whose lives were a scandal, and whose duties were utterly neglected. He began by proceeding against one or two flagrant offenders against morals and decency. He found the task of reform far more difficult than he had anticipated. He had but small real power over the clergy. The Church being "established," the Missionary Society in England assumed that it was able to look after itself, and declined to take any of the clergy upon its pay-rolls. That sharpest kind of discipline, cutting off the offender's salary, was therefore not available. Beside that, the clergy held their incumbency by the appointment of the Governor, and he was always jealous of any interference with his prerogatives. Moreover, the easy-going habits of the clergy suited the people very well. They were at heart somewhat afraid of the new type of minister which Dr. Bray held up as the model.¹ Believing that he could better serve the interest of his province from London than by remaining in it, he went home, and never again returned. For a while he continued to hold his office, but soon resigned it, joining in the request of the clergy of the colony, that another Commissary might be sent out; but until his death in 1730 he never flagged in his zeal. He pressed upon the authorities, without ceasing, the necessity of a resident bishop. He kept the Church at home informed concerning Maryland, collected money for it, and secured recruits for its ministry.

¹ Hawks: Ecclesiastical Contributions, New York, 1839, vol. ii, p. 213.

But in the colony the inevitable conflict between the clergy and the people began to develop itself. The resuscitation of Church life brought it out. While the clergy were apathetic, especially while they refrained from magnifying their office, it lay latent. But the toning up of the priestly standard, and above all the emphasis put upon the legal establishment, brought out to view the inherent conflict of interest. The history of the Church here, as in Virginia, is simply the story of the long controversy between the clergy, and the people represented by the legislature. Sometimes the Governor took one side and sometimes the other, and sometimes the contest was triangular. In this situation healthy Church life was impossible. Discipline could not be maintained. The confusion of rights and powers was hopeless. "Thus the proprietor selected a clergyman in England; the Bishop of London gave him a license; the Governor inducted him; if he did wrong the Commissary tried him (if there happened to be a Commissary); and, when convicted, no power punished him; for, after induction, even the proprietor could not remove him, and the Bishop of London could neither give nor take away the meanest living in the province."¹ Nor were the laws any more able to protect good clergy in their rights than to punish bad ones for their faults. When a new Commissary, Mr. Henderson, landed in 1730, he barely escaped being mobbed.² A chivalric layman struck him in the face, and the blow was meekly borne; he struck him a second time, and received such a drubbing from the reverend man's hands as taught him never to do the like again.¹ Another clergyman took to task a layman who had slandered the cloth generally, and for doing so was challenged to fight a duel. When he declined he was set upon by the layman and beaten within an inch of his life.² The breach between clergy and people grew wider yearly. The Romanists and Presbyterians looked on with unconcealed glee. The Church's extremity was their opportunity, which they did not fail to embrace. The Churchmen saw that the only hope of salvation for the distracted Church lay in securing a resident bishop who could assume the reins, and bring order out of the confusion. They represented the case so strongly to the authorities of the mother Church, that for the first time, after a century of effort, consent was secured. Gibson, Bishop of London, asked the clergy to select a fit man, send him to England, and he would consecrate him his suffragan for Maryland.³ Whether the Bishop had secured the royal warrant for his proposed action is somewhat doubtful. But in any case it was not put to the test. For when the Maryland clergy chose Colebatch, one of their number, in obedience to his mandate, the Colonial Legislature issued a writ ne exeat and forbade him to leave the province.

¹ Hawks: Ecclesiastical Contributions, vol. ii. p. 190.

² Ib.: vol. ii. p. 204.

The local legislature could not disestablish the Church, but, by a series of sinister acts, they made the Establishment worse than useless. Little by little the Church ceased to lean upon it, but unfortunately was not able to disentangle itself so as to stand upon a purely religious footing.

Legislation hostile to the Church.

¹ Hawks: vol. ii. p. 205.

² Ib. p. 206.

³ Ib. p. 196.

Here again, as everywhere, they who took the sword perished by the sword. "Had affairs," says Dr. Hawks, "been permitted to proceed to their natural termination without that interruption caused by the American Revolution, the time would have come when the singular spectacle would have been seen of the extinction of a church established by law, while no man could have found in the legislation of the country a statute depriving it of its character as an establishment. The law that gave it preference would have still stood unrepealed among the early acts of the province; while the history of its downfall might be traced in the side blows of an indirect legislation."¹ Under the circumstances Romanism took a fresh start; the Presbyterians flocked in from Pennsylvania and Delaware, and from Ulster direct; and the Church of England gradually but surely lost ground and lost character. At the close of the period before us, while devout and godly men like Bray, Henderson, Boucher, and many others had given themselves to her service, still the Church had fallen far behind in the march of population; had many unworthy men serving at her altars; had gained the enduring hostility of dissenters; lost the love of her own children, and waited for the political catastrophe out of whose ruins she was to emerge to a new and better life.

¹ Hawks: vol. ii. p. 247.

CHAPTER XI.

THE COMMISSARIES : VIRGINIA.

DURING all the time that Dr. Bray was the Bishop of London's representative for Maryland, Dr. Blair held the same office in Virginia. His was by far the largest and most important service of all the Commissaries. Beginning the duties of his office in 1685, he continued in it fifty-three years. He was a Scotchman, in Scotch orders, and with a Scotch temper; shrewd, far-sighted, cautious, and masterful. His Orders and his policy were more than once called in question, but they were both more than vindicated in the issue. When he first surveyed his field he found a population loyal to the Church and Crown. Virginia boasted herself as the "ever-faithful colony." Her people were pleased to say that "Charles II was King in Virginia before he was in England." The Puritan revolution which broke over the Church both at home and in the colonies left this one practically untouched. Her people lived on serenely, preserving their old fashions of life and worship, without much thought of the saints or their Commonwealth. They still called themselves the servants of the King, and when the Stuart line ended they transferred their loyalty to William and Mary. Neither nonjuror nor dis-senter gained influence among them. Dr. Blair, upon his arrival, found the most unmixed Episcopal community that has ever existed on this Continent. He found a considerable number of clergy still surviving whose standard of life and work was modelled upon that of the saintly Hunt and the apostolic Whittaker. But he found a still larger number who had fallen away from the heroic type of the early days, and had conformed themselves to the lower manner of life which had then fairly set in. The lack of education, among clergy and people both, struck the Commissary with a special horror. To correct this, he set about a plan which had been intermittently wrought upon almost from the first settlement of the colony. That was to establish and endow an institution of learning, which should be, first of all, a seminary for educating a ministry, and, in addition, a college, a school for the youth of the colonists, and a place where the children of the native Indians could be educated in civilization and Christianity. "To furnish a seminary of Ministers of the Gospel, educate youth in good manners, and propagate truth among the Indians in these parts," was the way the charter stated it. The establishment of William and Mary College is due chiefly to the tireless, patient, arduous labor of Dr. Blair, its first president. His expectation that the Church people would forward his plans with enthusiasm for so desirable a purpose was bitterly disappointed. He found them for the most part apathetic, and often hostile. Nowhere in the colonies were social distinctions so sharply drawn and so long-lived as in Virginia. The rich and cultured had already begun to form a caste, and to draw away from the common people. The sympathies of the clergy were largely with the former. In some cases they were their friends and relatives; in still more, their humble retainers. The rich planters would have none of the new college. They did not need it for themselves, and did not want it for others. They sent their own sons home to be trained, like Madam Esmond's boys, at English schools and universities, and to learn the manners suited to their rank in life. If the sons of the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker should get a smattering of polite learning, in a cheap way, out in the backwoods, the effect would only be to induce them to forget their place, and the proper distinctions among persons would be lost sight of. The general sentiment of the clergy corresponded. They were not conscious of special defect in themselves in point of learning, and could not see why the present condition of things should not continue. Quæta non movere!

William and Mary College.

The official opinion in England was the same. It looked upon the colony as a "plantation," not as the beginning of a State. When the Attorney-General was asked to draw up a charter for the projected college, he declined to have anything to do with such a piece of folly. When the Commissary pressed the duty upon him, and urged that the colonists also had souls which demanded care, he broke out with, "Damn their souls! let them grow tobacco!" Dr. Blair persisted, however, in spite of clerical apathy, lay hostility, and official reluctance. He opened the subscription with one hundred and fifty pounds from his own meagre salary. He secured twenty-five hundred pounds from the merchants of London, — the class of Englishmen who were always best informed concerning American affairs. Through the influence of Governor Nicholson a grant of twenty thousand acres of land was secured for an endowment. But when Sir Edmund Andros came into authority, every conceivable obstacle was placed in the Commissary's way. Not only was he personally slighted, but the power of his principal called in question. "Such of the clergy as are most refractory against [the Bishop of London's] authority are upon that account received into favor. It is a common maxim among [the Governor's] friends that we have nothing to do with the Bishop of London, nor no Church power."¹ The Governor gave nothing himself, and dissuaded his friends, not only from subscribing, but from paying what they had already subscribed.² Squatters were allowed to sit down upon the College grant, and the rightful owners were powerless either to have them put off or to have the land surveyed.³

The idea was diligently promoted that the setting up of the college meant the setting up of a new tax-rate for its maintenance. Many of the clergy were of the sort who were both unable and unwilling to further the really noble ends which the Commissary had in view; nor were his manners or methods always the best fitted to commend them. "Your clergy in these parts," writes an intelligent visitor to the Bishop of Lichfield, the King's almoner, "are of a very ill example. No discipline or canons of the Church are observed. They are for the most part Scotchmen, people indeed so basely educated, and so little acquainted with the excellency of their charge and duty, that their lives and conversations are more fitted to make heathens than Christians."¹ He adds that what the people need above all things is a bishop; that if a right reverend father, of the stamp of Governor Nicholson of Maryland, should come, it "would make hell tremble;" that the people are much affronted because the Bishop of London has sent one Dr. Blair, a Scotchman, to represent him, whereas there might surely have been found an English clergyman to fill that office; and that Dr. Blair and the Governor were at loggerheads about the matter of the new college. But Dr. Blair persisted, and in 1700 building was begun at Williamsburg, from plans contributed by Sir Christopher Wren. Once the college was really in existence, and was found to be an institution in which the people might take pride, they turned toward it with much affection. It became at once, and continued for some time to be, a centre of influence for the Church. It was influential in raising the tone of both the clergy and the laity. It secured a better educated ministry. For a while it had some success in its plans for training the Indian youth. Seventy are reported as having been at one time under its teaching.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Va. p. 4.

² Ib. p. 18.

³ Ib. p. 20.

The college and the Church.

But the elevation of the ministerial profession, effected largely through the Commissary's educational and disciplinary measures, brought out here, as the same causes did in Maryland, the latent conflict between the English Church and the American people. The clergy represented a foreign authority, of which the still loyal Virginians had already begun to feel jealous. As the jealousy deepened, the people and clergy began to grow apart. When Dr. Blair died the people declared they would never receive his successor. Discipline de-

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Va. p. 30.

Decline of discipline. elined, and the clergy became at the same time looser in their living, and more strenuous in insisting upon the right of support which was theirs by virtue of the Establishment. For many years the dreary story drags on,—the vestries trying to reduce parish tax-rates by refusing to induct ministers into their livings, the clergy growing sharper in seizing their legal perquisites, and the honest priests and godly people grieving more and more at the deplorable state into which things had fallen. This last class never ceased their efforts to bring about better things. They addressed the Governor, represented the facts to the Attempt at reform. Bishop of London, petitioned the Assembly, but to little purpose. One of their best digested plans for improvement gives a strange picture of the Church life of the time. It is a “Proposition” submitted to the Assembly in 1724. It¹ sets forth “the bad constitution of this country,” especially in the following particulars :—

(1) Many parishes are so small that they cannot defray the minister’s maintenance.

(2) Those parishes that are able are tempted to keep no minister, for, being without him, they keep so much of the parish levy in their own pockets.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, Virginia, p. 334.

(3) The livings of this country, "by reason of their meanness, encourage only the lowest sized divines to adventure among us, and by their equality of salary leave the diligent to fare equally with the negligent and blockish."

(4) The precarious tenure by which they hold their living, being liable to be ejected by the vestry without any cause assigned, either keeps the better sort of ministers away, or compels them soon to leave.

(5) The want of plantations and mansion-houses, and the extreme difficulty of finding boarding places, specially for married clergy.

(6) The abuses put upon them by the sheriff and tax collectors, who either pay their salaries in bad tobacco, or delay paying it till there is no market or freight for it.

(7) The want of some effective mode of discipline, which will be able to deal with the scandalous ministers.

To cure these evils, it proposes :

To consolidate two or three small livings into one decent one ; that whenever a new settlement of a hundred tithables springs up within seven miles of a church, the vestry must build a chapel in it, to which chapel the incumbent must give a portion of his time ; that the vestry be compelled to pay the amount of the minister's salary into the church fund, whether they "induct" him or not ; to change the amount of salary from a fixed sum of sixteen thousand pounds of tobacco, to forty pounds per poll, so that the salary will vary with the population, and, consequently, with the importance of the parish ; that the glebe shall always contain "enough land to employ five or six hands, have on it a house with a brick chimney and glass windows, a shingled roof, have at least one clear story ten foot pitch with two rooms and a closet and kitchen ;" that the glebe be stocked by the parish with four or five negroes under an overseer, and seven or eight milch cows ; that the incumbent shall have the right to appoint the tax collector ; that every minister who brings a license to the colony shall be examined by the Commissary and " certain of the learnedest ministers ;" shall in their presence " display his talents by a set discourse against Popery, Quakerism, or any other prevailing heresy ;" that any minister who shall be found guilty of fornication, adultery, blasphemy, ridiculing the Holy Scriptures, or practising against the Thirty-nine Articles, shall be suspended for three years ; that for cursing, swearing, drunkenness, or fighting (except in self-defence), he shall be suspended for one year ; that because drunkenness is one of the most common crimes, and, at the same time, one of the hardest to be proved, the following shall be taken as sufficient proof of the offence : " sitting an hour or longer in a company where they are a-drinking of healths, and taking his cups as they come round ; striking, challenging, threatening to fight, or laying aside his garments for that purpose ; staggering, reeling, vomiting, impertinent or obscene talking, — the proof of these to proceed until the judges are satisfied that the minister's behavior was unbecoming or failing of the gravity of a minister ; provided, that inasmuch as many of the signs be fallible as proofs of drunkenness (for vomiting may happen to a sober person from weakness of stomach, and reeling from a sudden disease causing giddiness of the head), two or three credible witnesses who were in the company (and not drunk themselves) shall declare upon oath that in their opinion drunkenness was the cause of these signs ;” that to each several article of this proposition “the lawyers shall contrive such good binding clauses and penalties that the law will execute itself.”

POHICK CHURCH, VIRGINIA

The heroic remedies proposed show how deep-seated and diffused the malady was. But it must not be supposed that the Church was dead or its clergy all scandalous. Godly and well-learned men were serving her altars, and from time to time new churches were being organized by the noble laymen of which Virginia was fruitful even during this period. “King Carter” built a church at his own expense in the Northern Neck.¹ A new church was built at Gloucester, with pulpit “hung with costly lace and damask, and a fine picture of the Last Judgment” was set over the altar before which the Washingtons worshipped.² A dozen others in the colony date from the same period. Washington, Patrick Henry, Harry Lee, John Randolph of Roanoke, and others whose names afterward rang through two continents, were alive, working, scheming, planning, praying in the Church. A Welsh colony of Church of England people moved into Virginia and Southern Pennsylvania, and for a while maintained a vigorous and flourishing life, but were ultimately swept into the rising stream

Devoted men
in the Church.

¹ Rev. Philip Slaughter in Perry's Hist. vol. i. p. 628.

² Ib. p. 627.

of Americanism, caught in the current of the revivalism which was then sweeping southward like a torrent, and, for the most part, carried away from the Church.

A root of bitterness had been planted from which sprung up a pestilent fruit. The next generation found but the ruins of their fathers' altars, their church walls crumbled and overgrown.

An irreconcilable conflict of interests forced the clergy and people apart, and brought disaster upon the Church. The evil was inherent in the situation.

The real question at issue was but dimly discerned by either party to it. It was the foredoomed struggle which became inevitable when the colonies were planted, and, sooner or later, was fought out in each one of them.

The peculiar shape it assumed varied in the several commonwealths, but was in essence the same in all. In Virginia it was settled in its ecclesiastical form before it was opened in its civil shape. It came to an issue in the celebrated "Parsons' Cause."¹ The situation was as follows: The Church of England was established by law and supported by revenue from taxation. The political divisions known in the Northern colonies as townships were here parishes. The vestry was elected by the legally qualified voters. It was in their hands to "induct" to his living the minister nominated by the Governor representing the Bishop of London. Being once inducted, a salary of sixteen thousand pounds of tobacco was due him by law, to be collected by the sheriff. Tobacco was a commodity which fluctuated in value from year to year. In the seasons when it was low in the market, the parson pocketed his loss and waited to recoup himself next year, when it might be high. The quantity of sixteen thousand pounds was nominated in the bond. In 1763, a series of years in which the tobacco had been very low was followed by a time of very high prices. The parson could put his tobacco on the market and make good what he had lost in the preceding years. But the laity were reluctant to hand over the weed. By withholding it they could fill their own purses, and at the same time squeeze out the clergy against whom their grudge had steadily risen. The only thing to hinder was the law. This they found a way to evade, or rather violate. The Assembly passed an act to pay the parsons' salaries in Virginia currency, at the rate of twopence halfpenny per pound for the tobacco. In effect, it confiscated their tobacco and compelled them to take for it a price less than one-fourth of that which it would have brought in the market. But the Assembly knew that they were acting ultra vires in passing such a law. It was null and void, without the indorsement of the Crown. This, they knew, it never would receive. They therefore made it operative for a period of ten months from the time it was enacted. This, as they estimated, would cover the time required to take an appeal across the water and return, and in the mean while, for that year, at least, their purpose would have been gained. The clergy asked to be heard in opposition to the act, and were refused. They therefore drew together for consultation as to the ruin which threatened them. They chose a committee of their number who proceeded to England to protest before the Privy Council. The Crown lawyers assured them that the act was of no legal force whatever, and advised them to go back and sue for their salaries. They followed the advice, and the Rev. Thomas Warrington, of Elizabeth City, made up his case as a test. His plea was that the act was inequitable, in that it, without warning and without redress, cut down the salaries from four hundred pounds to one hundred and fifty pounds; that it was a breach of contract which was perilous to every citizen; that the act was null and void wanting the royal indorsement. The case for the vestry, against whom his suit was brought, was so bad that no lawyer with a reputation would touch it. When the case was imminent, there chanced to be a lawyer without either legal reputation or social standing, himself a Churchman, who was willing to undertake it. His name Patrick Henry. was Patrick Henry. His argument before the jury raised him to celebrity at a bound, showed his wonderful sagacity, and brought into dazzling vividness the Church's position in America. He brushed away all question of either law or technical equity. He declared that England had no essential right to tax this country for any purpose; that the colonies had both the right and the ability to regulate their own affairs, religious as well as civil; that the only purpose of religion which law can recognize is its function of making good citizens; that the community wherein this function is exercised must regulate it; that the clergy by appealing to a foreign state had proven themselves to be at once bad citizens and unworthy ministers. These contentions he made effective, not only, and probably not chiefly, through his overwhelming eloquence, but because he put into words, biting, burning, unforgettable words, the sentiments which were and had long been vaguely in the people's hearts. In any case, through the plea of a man himself a devout communicant of the Church, addressed to a jury composed of hereditary Churchmen, the Church in the person of its clergy was defeated in a case where it had all the law, all the justice, and all the traditions of a hundred and fifty years on its side. The Church appealed to Cæsar, — and lost. The appeal was never repeated. The breach was final.¹ Ten years later, it was evident to all that the Church could not grow in America until it should be, either by kindly or forcible means, disentangled from the English state.

¹ For the best account of this important event see Prof. Moses Coit Tyler: Life of Patrick Henry, p. 32, et seq.

¹ Anderson: vol. iii. p. 136.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, Va. 490, et seq.

Passing southward from Virginia, the population gradually became more sparse, and clustered about Charleston and Savannah as its chief points of radiation. The Church life in Oglethorpe's Georgia settlement will come in sight in connection with Whitefield and the Wesleys and the Methodist movement. In North Carolina it remained weak throughout the century. The Scotch and later on the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians early made a lodgement in the territory, and became, in connection with the Baptists,² the dominant religious influence. In

The Church
in other colonies.

¹ Tyler: Patrick Henry, p. 77.

² Benedict: History of the Baptist Denomination in America. Boston, 1820, p. 333.

INTERIOR OF GOOSE CREEK CHURCH, EARLY COLONIAL ARCHITECTURE, STON, S.C.

GOOSE CREEK CHURCH, SOUTH CAROLINA
(Early Colonial)

South Carolina at the opening of the eighteenth century, there was one strong parish at Charleston, — the only one in the province. Between that time and the Revolution it had gained another parish in the same city, had spread to Beaufort, and from there as a second centre, to Goosecreek, Prince George, Santee, through and among the new plantations, and in the new settlements, as they one by one sprang up.¹ As early as 1707 the S. P. G. maintained six clergy in the province and had sent over two thousand volumes of books for gratuitous distribution.² Two-thirds of the population at the beginning of the century were Dissenters. This proportion was increased by a stream of immigration from Massachusetts and the Northern colonies. The Church of England, on the other hand, was swelled by a considerable number of French Huguenots, whose names still survive. An ill-advised and impotent attempt to establish the Church, with rigorous laws against the Dissenters, — an attempt so indefensible that Queen Anne declared the act null and void, and the S. P. G. refused to send any more missionaries till it should be abandoned, — gained the ill-will of the majority of the people. In spite, however, of the internal broils in the colony, of frequent and wasteful wars with the Indians; in spite of the demoralizing effect of slavery, which, owing to the rice culture, showed itself more quickly in South Carolina than elsewhere,³ the Church continued to more than hold her own until the great cataclysm.¹ A larger proportion of native-born clergy were probably produced in this than in any other colony save Connecticut. This fact kept the priesthood and people more in touch with each other, and saved the Church there from much of the evil which befell her in Maryland and Virginia.

¹ J. J. Pringle Smith, in Perry: History, vol. i. p. 638.

² Graham: Colonial History, vol. i. p. 389.

³ Ib.: p. 292.

In the Northern group of colonies the Commissary régime was little more than a name. The local churches, for the most part, managed their own affairs.

¹ Perry: History, vol. i, p. 394.

CHAPTER XII.

THE NEW ENGLAND CONVERTS.

IN the early years of the last century there lived at Guilford, Conn., a certain Mr. Smithson, whose name has been kept from oblivion through a single kindly deed of his. He gave a Prayer-Book to young Timothy Cutler, a graduate of Harvard, and a candidate for the Puritan ministry. In 1720 the Rev. Dr. Cutler was the honored president of Yale College, and had read his Prayer-Book to good purpose. Remote from the Church, unskilled in her ways, holding high office in a society which was her hereditary enemy, he had learned to love the Prayer-Book, and to think of the Church kindly. Many of the prayers he committed to memory, and used, consciously and unconsciously, in his conduct of public worship. Their spirit colored all his own effusions, until he came to be noted for his "gifts in prayer."¹ He gathered about him a little group of men like-minded with himself, and for several years they quietly and patiently pursued a study of the nature and organization of the Church. Just a century before, this had been the burning question of the age. But at that time the combatants on either hand had not been in a temper to settle it on its merits. With

¹ Beardsley: History of the Church in Connecticut, vol. i. p. 34.

Laud on the one side and the Puritans on the other, Star Chamber writs, broadswords, and pikes had been the weapons. The sparks struck in such collisions are brilliant but not illuminating. The Truth had shrunk away into the background, as she always does to avoid strife. But now the contest had long ago subsided. Episcopacy had won in Old England and Presbytery in the New. The parties to the strife deemed the matter settled because they were out of each other's hearing. President Cutler and his friends were Presbyterians, but students, calm-minded and lovers of truth.

A question pressed upon them which is one of the most imperious that can assail any man, and is, at the same time, one for the entertainment of which he usually receives little sympathy. To speak for God as His minister is the most awful prerogative that any man can assume. No sober-minded man will offer to do so without the clearest warrant. But from where shall he receive this warrant? No man can give it to him of his own authority. He cannot trust to his own inward "call," for he knows too well the untrustworthiness of human emotions. Whence shall he derive a commission which will justify him to himself in the assumption of so great an office? An honest search for the answer to this question has led into the ministry of this Church a large proportion of her priesthood. They ask themselves, "By what authority dost thou these things, and who gave thee this authority?" The unique honor of being the first of this class in the American Church belongs to President Cutler and the little group of Puritan ministers who gathered of Orders.

The question

about him. The college library provided the means to solve their doubts. Scant as it was, it fortunately contained the works of Barrow, Tillotson, Burnet, Sherlock, Patrick, and Whitby, masters¹ of definition and argument for the Episcopal theory of the Church. Slowly, and evidently with reluctance, the little band of students were forced to the conclusion that their ministerial commissions were defective, not because their acts under them were lacking in power, — a pirate or a guerilla chieftain may be potent without any commission, — but because they were lacking in authority, emanating as they did from an organization which had separated itself from the league of Christian States. “I hoped,” says one of them, “that when I was ordained I had satisfied myself of the validity of Presbyterian ordination under the circumstances. But alas! I have ever since had growing suspicions that all is not right, and that I am an usurper in the House of God.” Of course, this will seem but the vagary of a diseased sentiment, to all who think of the Church as organized by men and deriving its authority from the consent of its members. But he who has a deep sense of the very reality of priestly acts, especially if he have a timid conscience, will understand and sympathize with his perplexity. Gradually the convictions of the little company settled upon the Church of England. It

The Church's attraction. attracted them, not as a strong political establishment, — its political entanglement was but a stumbling-block to them; not by the sweet strains of its Liturgy, — that sound had never fallen upon their ears ; not by its formulated dogmas, — these did not seriously differ from those which they held already ; but solely by its power as an Apostolic Church to confer a valid commission upon men to preach the Divine Word and administer the awful Sacraments. This clear and simple conviction determined their action, and, through them and their spiritual successors, went far to fix in that mould in which it is still held, the American Church's way of thinking of the ministry.

¹ Beardsley: History of the Church in Connecticut, vol. i. p. 35.

Few of these men's confrères knew or suspected the direction in which they were moving. At the college commencement Sept. 13, 1722, President Cutler asked the trustees to meet him in the library at the close of the exercises. When all were assembled he read them a statement which acted upon them, and through them upon New England society, like an electric shock. The statement, signed by himself and six tutors and fellows of the college, stripped to simplicity, was, that the signers were doubtful of or convinced against the validity of Presbyterian ordination, and had determined to apply for Orders in the Church of England. The surprise and consternation were indescribable. It was as though in our day the president and faculty of Princeton should declare for the Pope, or the dean and professors of the General Seminary should avow themselves Quakers. Lamentation resounded on every hand. A day of fasting and prayer was called to avert the Divine wrath at the strange defection of these leaders in Israel. The converts had offered to make a public statement and defence of their position if it should be desired. It was desired, and a day for the great debate fixed during the session of the Connecticut Legislature. The Governor, Saltonstall, presided with courtesy and fairness, rebuking the railing spirit in which their opponents conducted their arguments. Of course nothing came of the debate but to fix each side more firmly in its own opinion. Cutler was "excused" from any further duties in the college. Three of his associates resigned their charges and cast in their lot with him, burning their bridges behind them. Several, more timid or less convinced, retained their connection with the Puritan establishment, but preserving all their lives a friendly attitude toward the Church. Three

President Cutler and professors enter the Church. of them, Cutler, Brown, and Johnson, proceeded at once to England for ordination. Their name and fame had gone before them. They were received with a warm welcome.

Cutler and Johnson were ordained, but Brown perished of smallpox. A second parish lately organized in Boston called Cutler to be its rector. Johnson went to Stratford, where there had been for many years a little group of Church of England families, became their pastor, and entered upon that long career of use and influence hardly surpassed by any name in the Church's annals. He was invited by Benjamin Franklin to become the head of the newly organized College of Philadelphia, later known as the University of Pennsylvania. He declined, and accepted another invitation to the presidency of King's College, afterward Columbia University.

The great gain to the American Church by this movement was not that she had added half a dozen able men to her meagre ministry. It was that a new and abiding source of supply had been opened. These were but the advanced guard of a host of men of similar type who have entered the Church since their time from the same motives. It was the sporadic outbreak in America of the movement which had set in still earlier in England. "At this time there was a strong tendency in the Presbyterian type of Puritanism to conform in England. . . . A little reasonableness on the part of the English bishops would have swept the entire Presbyterian party of England into the Established Church."¹ Their influence was at once felt in New England, beginning in Connecticut. Within a generation the Church under the leadership of a native born ministry had penetrated every town, had effected a lodgement in every Puritan stronghold, had drawn into her membership large numbers of that sober-minded, self-contained, tenacious people who constitute her membership in New England to-day. The opposition of the Puritan authorities was pronounced and bitter. It showed itself in a series of petty and vexatious acts of persecution, some of which amounted to grievous wrongs. But the innate kindliness and cautious fair-mindedness of the Connecticut people constantly interposed to break the blows of Puritan zeal.² Laws were made which worked in favor of the "Established Order" and against the Church, and remained in force for a hundred and a movement.

Beginning of

Puritan opposition.

¹ Briggs: American Presbyterianism, p. 146.

² Perry: History, i. 290, et seq.

fifty years.¹ Occasionally they wrought great hardship, but, upon the whole, the Church in New England had less to complain of in the eighteenth century than dissenters had in New York and the Southern colonies. The idea of invoking force of any sort to the aid of doctrine or order was gradually but surely retiring into that evil place from which it had emerged to curse the Church of God.

The drift toward the Church in New England received a very substantial impulse by the visit to America of one of England's great and holy Dean Berkeley. In 1729 Dean Berkeley commenced his three years' sojourn at Newport in the interest of his brilliant but fruitless scheme of a great American University. His plan was to establish somewhere a foundation which should be to the colonies what Oxford and Cambridge were to Britain. It is his great honor to have been the first of eminent Englishmen to discern the future greatness of the western world. He prayed and strove that it might be built up upon the twin foundations of religion and learning. He was himself a notable example of both. By dint of his wonderful power of persuading men, and the sweet graciousness of his person, he had extorted from the English minister, Walpole, a grant of twenty thousand pounds for his American University. But to secure the grant was one thing, to secure the money quite another. Walpole intimated to him that it would not likely be paid unless he should show his earnestness in the matter by going himself to America. In pursuance of this advice, he took up his abode at Newport. His reputation as a philosopher, a scholar, and a saint, had preceded him. Learned men in America made pilgrimages to meet him, and came away unconsciously biassed in favor of a Church which could produce and retain such a man. The fact that the representatives of royalty in the colonies were always Churchmen had had its effect in attracting many to her. Now the fact that a prince in the kingdom of letters was one of her sons brought her into reputation in a different quarter. His visitors went to see a philosopher and found also a Churchman. The effect of his sojourn was marked in many ways. His friend the painter Smibert followed his fortunes, and from Smibert the Americans Copley and West caught their inspiration.¹ When he returned to England, despairing of his project, he left his library of one thousand volumes to Yale College and gave his Rhode Island farm to found a post-graduate scholarship in the same university. These gifts were golden benefactions to the struggling learning of the time. From his foundation at Yale, a stream of great men have gone forth, all more or less influenced by his spirit, and with a kindly feeling towards the Church of their benefactor. By his gift the immortal writings of Hooker and Chillingworth found a place in the college library and moulded the lives of many of the seekers after the Church.² His advice and counsel fixed in the structure of Pennsylvania University and Columbia College, that principle of union in religion and learning which these institutions so long retained.¹ As a Christian, a Churchman, and a man, he greatly promoted the success which marked the Church in the Northern colonies through the first half of the eighteenth century.

¹ It was not until 1878 that the parishes in Connecticut were at liberty to organize according to the Church's theory; up to that time they were all chartered as Congregational "Societies" under a general act.

¹ Arnold: History of Rhode Island, ii. p. 99.

² Beardsley: Life of Samuel Johnson, p. 75.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Samuel Johnson, p. 75.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE "GREAT AWAKENING"

IN 1735 Jonathan Edwards was pastor of the Puritan church of Northampton, Massachusetts.¹ Young man as he was, he was already famous. When a mere child, he knew Greek and Hebrew. When a lad, he pondered deeply upon "fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute." In his beautiful body dwelt the fairest of souls, and the subtlest of understandings. His sweet young wife had also dreamed dreams and seen visions. A pair of mystics, enthusiasts, poets, and theologians, they journeyed hand in hand to his first parish at Northampton. He began his ministry at the time when the lament was heard on every hand that pure religion was perishing from off the face of the earth. The lament was not without cause. A distinct relaxation of religious life had already set in, and was as marked in New England as elsewhere in the colonies. "It began as soon as it was evident that the unique experiment of the Puritan fathers was over, when the theocracy which had inspired such enthusiasm was hastening to its downfall. It was as if God had turned away from favoring an enterprise which had His glory in view as its sole object and justification."¹ The fierce religionism of the early Puritan life could not be sustained. In a century it had burned itself out. A revolt against its hard and exacting spirit had already spread. Only the shell of it remained. The strong, if unlovely, life which had tenanted it was dying. Its remaining energy was wasting itself in theological quarrels barren of permanent result.² Meanwhile, carelessness of religion and looseness of living were rife. Edwards's deeply religious spirit was profoundly moved by the situation when he came to realize it. Believing, as he did with all his being, in the inborn helplessness of all men to do or think any good thing, in a heaven whose ravishing beauty his poetic eye could see, and a hell whose blackness and torment were to him a very present fact, his preaching assumed a tone which had not before been heard. His great store of theology furnished him with matter, his poetic instinct enabled him to set it in colors which men could not help but see, his psychologic skill qualified him to find a lodgement for his words in the heart and imagination of every hearer.

¹ Allen: Life of Jonathan Edwards, pp. 133, 248.

¹ Tracy: The Great Awakening, Boston, 1845, passim.

The "Revival" at Northampton.

Such sermons as his had never been heard. From preaching to his people once on Sunday, he came to preaching thrice. Then they came in crowds to hear him on a week-day as well. Then he preached every day. Then all business was gradually laid aside, and the people asked, "Brethren, what must I do to be saved?" All human concerns fell into insignificance before the great question in the presence of which the whole community sat down in despair.

¹ Allen: p. 53.

² e. g., the "Half-way Covenant."

The peculiar answer which Edwards gave to this question has profoundly affected the religious life of America, shaped the fortunes of the Church, and yet dominates the Christian life of the land. Before his time both Churchman and Puritan had conceived of religion as an outward life. It was obedience to a law or set of laws. It consisted of moral and religious conduct. The two parties had differed profoundly and often as to what particular action or class of actions were bounden on a Christian, but they had been at one in the assumption that religion is a question of right living.¹

Edwards taught that it was a question of right feeling. His theory has passed into the popular mind and is yet dominant. He replied to the eager questionings of his Northampton people that "conversion" is a drama which must perforce be played out consciously in each individual soul. Its characteristic stages were, first, a profound and awful sense of sin, guilt, helplessness, fear of God's wrath, dread of dire penalty, an internal agony which might border close upon madness; second, a period more or less prolonged of doubtfulness, hope alternated with despair, glimpses of God's mercy only to be obscured by the vapors rising from a corrupt heart; third, a sudden and conscious emergence into a haven of sweet peace, a serene and heavenly frame, a sense of pardoned sin and acceptance with God. He and his gracious wife, children of God from the womb, persuaded themselves that they had passed through this sequence of experiences. He watched over his inquirers, and led them with infinite skill through its stages, — preserving the while the curious attitude of a scientific observer of the phenomena, — and helped them to find peace for their souls.

¹ Roger Williams had been banished for teaching that it is an inward experience.

His peculiar doctrine of salvation possesses singular fascination for the populace. It is capable of being put to an immediate test. It is less burdensome and exacting than it is to confront with a definite Christian purpose the complex and contradictory experiences of human life.

The revival quickly passed beyond the bounds of the Northampton parish, but by the time it had done so it had taken on another peculiarity even more striking. In the spiritual agony through which awakened souls were passing daily, the bodies of some began to show a strange sympathy. Men fell prostrate upon the earth and lay writhing, they lost temporarily the power of speech, their limbs moved rhythmically, heaven and hell became visible to their fixed and staring eyes. This new phenomenon for the moment staggered Edwards, but he soon satisfied himself that it came from God. Why should not the body sympathize with the soul? It was but the outward sign of the inward and invisible grace at work. He at once encouraged and tried to regulate the strange manifestation. The outbreak of this new phenomenon attracted fresh attention to the movement. It began to spread. Sober and godly men set themselves against it in vain. Such opposition is always but half-hearted, from fear lest haply one be found fighting against God. Deerfield, Springfield, and far-away New Haven were "awakened." Churchmen and the more conservative Presbyterians stood aloof from the movement,¹ but the latter, after a long stand against "enthusiasm," succumbed. The movement gathered strength and impetus as it spread. Gilbert and William Tennent became its leaders in New Jersey. It swept in the Scotch Presbyterians in the back settlements of Pennsylvania. It worked down the valleys of Virginia, and drew in the multitudes of lapsed and indifferent Churchmen. It climbed the mountains into Tennessee and Kentucky. It found a welcome among the mystical German sects, and touched the mercurial Welsh Churchmen among the foot-hills of the Alleghanies. As it moved on through its seventy years' course its distinctive features became more and more marked. Strangest of all, they ceased to excite surprise, and came to be accepted as the ordinary concomitants of religion. An eye-witness narrates² that "a hundred and fifty of the congregation were so affected with violent spasmodic contractions of the muscles, jerking their heads quickly from side to side, frequently throwing their persons upon the ground, where they floundered like live fish. I have seen all denominations of religion exercised the same way, — gentleman and lady, black and white, young and old, without exception. I have passed a meeting-house about which the undergrowth had been cut away, leaving a hundred saplings standing breast-high, for the people to hold on to when they should have the jerks. I observed that when they had held on by them they had kicked up the earth as a horse does when stamping flies." Not only converts were so seized, but those who came to mock as well as those who came to pray. Sometimes it took grotesque and ludicrous forms. Some turned unseemly somersaults in the air; others leaped and yelled as the devil in departing rended them; and once a pack of men were found barking up a tree where they had "treed the devil."¹

¹ Briggs: American Presbyterian, pp. 251-2.

² Tracy: Great Awakening, p. 222.

When the movement reached Georgia it came in contact with the Church of England in the Meets person of George Whitefield. In response Whitefield. to Wesley's cry for aid, Whitefield had come out to Oglethorpe's colony as missionary to the Indians. Few men were ever less fitted for that duty. Wisdom, patience, caution, the qualities which the missionary to the heathen needs, Whitefield had none of. Half-educated, impetuous, self-conscious, ignorant of himself, impatient of law, but with a burning religious zeal, and a power of popular eloquence as great as was ever given to mortal man, he was fitted to become the champion of the "Great Awakening." Laying aside all his plans and work, and disregarding all authority, he took up the burden of Jonathan Edwards's prophecy. Bearing Whitefield on its crest, a reflex wave of enthusiasm swept back northward, upturning Church order, sweeping some into the kingdom and leaving others stranded at its ebb, until the two prophets met in Edwards's parsonage in little Northampton. Whitefield's presence was a stumbling-stone and a rock of offence. He was a clergyman of the Church of England. With but very few exceptions, his brethren had held aloof from or definitely opposed the movement. Its root principle seemed to them to be both false and dangerous. Whitefield assailed them savagely, as his successors have often done since, for their bearing toward "this gracious work of God." "Unconverted men;" "without vital piety;" "pagans;" "dumb dogs that will not bark." were the best words he had for them. He ostentatiously turned his back upon his fellows, and became the hero of the revivalists. The Puritan clergy made much of his zeal, contrasting it with the cold morality of the Church to the latter's great discredit. Churchmen either openly defended their position or waited for the reaction which was sure to come. It came even sooner than they had expected. The disorders which arise from the prevalence of a religion of the emotions divorced from the ordinances of the Church and the sanctions of the conscience soon made themselves seen.¹ The "travelling

¹ McMaster: History of the People of the United States, vol. ii. p. 580.

Attitude of Churchmen to the "Revival."

The reaction.

¹ The Rev. Timothy Cutler writes from Boston, September 24, 1743: "Whitefield has plagued us with a witness, especially his friends and followers, who themselves are like to be battered to pieces by that battering-ram they had provided against our Church here. It would be an endless attempt to describe that scene of confusion and disturbance occasioned by him, — the division of families, neighborhoods, and towns, the contrariety of husbands and wives, the undutifulness of children and servants, the quarrels among teachers, the disorders of the night, the intermission of labor and business, the neglect of husbandry and of preachers" who swarmed in New England brought such confusion into even the "Established Order" that the Puritan ministers themselves could not endure it. Whitefield turned away in dudgeon from the gentle rebuke of Edwards for his ill-tempered zeal, returned to England, and exercised his wonderful gifts, held in order by the tight hand of the Countess of Huntingdon. Edwards found the hearts of his own converts and parishioners turned against him. They whom he had carried through the crisis of their religious experiences refused longer to listen to him. Disappointed and heart-broken, he turned his steps away from his beloved Northampton, to his new home among the savage Indians.

gathering the harvest. Our presses are forever teeming with books, and our women with bastards, though regeneration and conversion is the whole cry. The teachers have, many of them, left their particular cures, and strolled about the country. Some have been ordained by them Evangelizers, and had their Armor-bearers and Exhorters; and in many conventicles and places of rendezvous there has been checkered work, indeed, several preaching, and several exhorting and praying at the same time, the rest crying or laughing, yelping, sprawling, fainting, and this revel maintained in some places many days and nights together, without intermission; and then there were the blessed outpourings of the Spirit!

"When Mr. Whitefield first arrived here the whole town was alarmed. He made his first visit to church on a Friday, and conversed first with many of our clergy together, belied them, me especially, when he had done. Being not invited into our pulpits, the Dissenters were highly pleased, and engrossed him; and immediately the bells rung, and all hands went to lecture; and this show kept on all the while he was here.

"After him came one Tennent, a monster! impudent and noisy, and told them they were all damn'd, damn'd, damn'd; this charmed them, and in the most dreadful winter I ever saw, people wallowed in the snow night and day for the benefit of his beastly brayings; and many ended their days under these fatigues. Both of them carried more money out of these parts than the poor could be thankful for.

"All this turned to the growth of the Church in many places, and its reputation universally; and it suffers no otherwise than as religion in general does, and that is sadly enough."

The effect of the movement upon the religious life of America cannot be over-estimated. It obliterated the old ecclesiastical divisions, and drew a new line of cleavage. It set and fixed the Church in that position which she still holds in American Protestantism. She was thrust by it involuntarily into that place which has proven her stronghold. There have been in this country since the "Great Awakening," and chiefly as its result, two radically distinct conceptions of Christianity. According to one theory it is primarily an experience, following in the main that which Edwards first fastened upon the popular mind. It appeals to consciousness. It devises machinery to awake the emotions. When they flag it has whips to stimulate them anew. It has the "Pilgrim's Progress" for its hornbook. Christian, the pilgrim, is the type of the truly converted man. It makes little of Sacraments. It empties them of their grace, and finds their rationale as a system of mnemonics. It distinguishes sharply between religion and morality. It uses faith as a word representing not the thing believed, but only the act of believing. It speaks its mind unconsciously in Moody and Sankey's hymns.

For the other theory the Church stands as the best accredited representative. This has for its starting-point not the adult, but the Christian child. It assumes it to be a child of God. It leans on Christian nurture. It looks upon the Church as the hospitable home in which all have a right; a right not contingent upon the passage through a conventional experience. It looks upon the Sacraments not as the

Effect upon American religion.

The Church's position.

marks and badges of a pious life already attained, but as the means of attainment thereto. It makes little of experiences. It is distrustful of spiritual cataclysms. It thinks that religious life to be most healthy which is least self-conscious. It refuses to distinguish between religion and morality, deeming them the same in essence.

For all this the Church has stood since the middle of the last century. The two contrasted conceptions of personal religion, of course, did not begin at that date. But the effect of the Great Awakening was to bring out their contrast before the popular sense, and to fix the Church's place as the representative of the latter. Her growth has always been most rapid in those communities where the rival theory has most completely run its course. But she has not remained uninfluenced by it. Much of the real religious life which was present in the movement passed into her possession. It has saved her from being hard and mechanical. The Evangelical movement which came two generations afterwards brought into her ministry men who accepted Edwards's theory wholly, preached it, lived by it, championed it, faulted the Church for not accepting it outright, were as great and as good as any prophets who have ever delivered their message from her pulpits. But as a school they passed away and left the Church in the same attitude in which they found her. The spirit of the Great Awakening speaks in some of the Church's hymns, modifies her practice in deciding upon the fitness of candidates for Confirmation, leads her often to adopt a popular phraseology which does not mean the same from her lips that it does from others; but, upon the whole, her ideal of the Christian life has remained unchanged.

Its influence upon the Church.

Here is to be found the secret of her steady growth at the expense of American Protestantism. The Episcopal Church is the only one which constantly gains from others, and seldom loses to them. They who lose, in their chagrin, often charge her with holding a low and easily attained standard of religious life. This is not the explanation. Her accessions are from those whose religious life is highest and deepest, but whose spiritual experience refuses to fit itself to the mould into which it is attempted to cast it. These, who seek righteousness of life, and are tortured as Edwards's poor people were through their feelings, seek the Church as the home of reasonable religion.¹

¹ It would be an interesting study to trace the effect of the Great Awakening upon the negro race in America. There is good reason to believe that their peculiar type of emotional religiousness, divorced from the sanctions of conscience, is due to this movement, which for the first time brought within their reach a conception of Christianity which fitted itself to their peculiar race temperament. There does not seem to be any evidence of their characteristic type of religion previous to this time. Since then it has dominated them as a people

CHAPTER XIV.

THE GERMANS.

WHILE the Commissaries were reforming the Church in the south, notable scholars coming to her aid in the east, and the Great Awakening was stirring the religious life of the whole land, the last great wave of pre-Revolutionary immigration broke over the middle colonies. It came from two quarters, Germany and Ireland. It brought in two great populations, one of whom has always remained indifferent and the other opposed to Episcopacy.

The ceaseless wars which became inevitable on the Continent of Europe when the Reformation motto cujus regio, ejus religio, was adopted, had wrought First German immigration. incalculable damage in Germany. The condition of the common people was deplorable. While the country was prolific of great scholars and leaders of the Reformation, the mass of the people retained much of their mediæval barbarism. The feudal spirit which made his people patient of the great Frederick's cane, and still keeps the citizens of a mighty empire docile under the personal rule of the Kaiser, made the common folk then helpless to rise out of their low state. Continual wars, changes of rule, changes of faith, bad government, made their lives intolerable.¹ Like the unfortunate in all lands they turned their faces to America. In the last years of the seventeenth century they began to come. The bulk of them came to Penn's colony. Through his German mother and his own sojourn at Cresheim on the Rhine, Penn knew them and they knew him. In 1683 Pastorius brought the first detachment of twenty families, sat down with them six miles from Philadelphia, and properly named the first German settlement Germantown.¹ A few recruits followed from time to time, but thirty years later immigration came en masse. In 1709 a horrible famine wasted their fatherland. Thousands perished of cold and hunger.² The heart of the world, which at that time was not easily moved at the sight of suffering, turned toward the poor, dying creatures with compassion. Good Queen Anne of England offered to give them lands and homes in America and to help them move. Multitudes took her at her word. Thirty thousand made their way to London to escape starvation through the queen's goodness.³ So many additional hungry mouths threatened to set up a famine there. The brutal populace of the city fell upon them in their poor camp at Blackmoor, beat them, drove them off to beg and starve among the lanes and hedges. Five thousand of them, being Roman Catholics, were sent back to Germany. Four thousand were sent to Ireland to settle waste lands about Limerick. The remainder, more than twenty thousand in number, were sent to America. Ten ships brought five thousand of them to New York at one time. They were carried up the Hudson and moved in behind the Dutch, who had lived for half a century on its western bank.¹ Their descendants are still found about Schoharie, Schenectady, Palatine Bridge, and westward to the head-waters of the Susquehanna. But the main stream came up the Delaware. Philadelphia was their entrepôt. Before the middle of the century the immigration had reached and sustained itself for several years at twelve thousand annually.² They moved in behind the English and Welsh and sat down upon the rich limestone soil which stretches westward to the Susquehanna. From Pennsylvania they crept southward into Virginia and western Maryland. A smaller, independent stream flowed into North Carolina and farther south.³ At the outbreak of the Revolution they constituted one-third the population of Pennsylvania.⁴ Their religious and social condition was of the very lowest. Ignorant when they left home, their exposure and suffering reduced them still lower. Many of them came as "Redemptioners," that is, persons who had sold themselves either outright or for a limited number of years to some shipmaster for the amount of their passage money. The advertisement pages of the dingy newspapers of the time are full of notices of rewards for runaway "Dutch servants." They were harshly treated, and upon the smallest excuse or no excuse at all had their time of servitude lengthened until many became hopeless bond slaves.

¹ Seebohm: Era of Protestant Revolution, p. 33.

¹ Reichel: Moravian History, p. 15.

² Ib. p. 15.

³ Ib. p. 16.

The "Pennsylvania Dutch."

¹ Smith: History of New York, p. 139.

² Proud: History of Pennsylvania, vol. ii. p. 273.

³ Williamson: History of North Carolina, vol. i. p. 184.

⁴ Proud: History of Pennsylvania, vol. ii. p. 273.

From a religious point of view they were all classified as "Lutherans." The distinction which the Germans began early to make between Lutherans and Reformed was not observed by English-speaking people in describing them. The various German sects were in popular speech lumped together as Lutherans, that is, Germans who were not Romanists. With the exception of the few leaders, and leading German families who were broadly marked off from the rank and file of their people, the mass were for the most part indifferent to religion in any form. The few preachers who at first accompanied their flocks gradually found their graves in the western wilds, or if yet living, their influence on new-comers was very slight. There were thousands, who, educated in Germany as Lutherans, but now scattered about in the forest wilds of America, never saw a church or cared for it. Many were so utterly indifferent to all religion that it became proverbial to say of those who cared nothing for God or His Word, that they belonged to "the Pennsylvania Church."¹ The chronic tendency of German Protestantism to division made their religious condition worse. They became a congeries of sects, some of them holding as their distinguishing mark the most grotesque and whimsical practice or tenet. The mystical "Mennonite" would not allow the baptism of infants, would not take an oath, refused to bear arms, and wore a peculiar dress. The "Tunkers" held to the same theological and ethical views, but wore a different dress, and made it a point of faith to wear their beards untouched by blade or scissors. The "Siebentagen" observed the seventh day of the week instead of the first to keep it holy, denounced marriage as a snare of Satan, lived in community, established an order of Protestant monks and nuns, and built for themselves monasteries, the broken walls of which still stand.¹ Anchorites lived solitary lives far in the forest, and hermits made their homes in the rocky caves along the Wissahickon. Besides these, Schwenkfelders and separatists of now forgotten names abounded. Their type may be seen in one sect which still exists, whose distinctive dogma is that men should wear hooks and eyes instead of buttons to fasten their clothes!

¹ Spangenberg: Life of Zinzendorf, p. 1230.

The numbers and character of the incoming Germans seriously alarmed the colonial authorities, and, after a prolonged agitation, it was checked and ultimately stopped by the imposition of a tax of forty shillings a head upon all comers. But before this was done the Germans who are now known as "Pennsylvania Dutch" had established themselves in a circle of settlements which surrounded the Church of England at those points where it was strongest. There they have remained ever since. They have preserved their original features of character and religious life with a tenacity which hardly any other class in America can equal. Simple-minded and coarse in fibre, but strong and pertinacious, they have held their own, and the Church has made but little impress upon them. With the exception of the great and saintly Muhlenbergs, and a few others of kindred spirit, their names are absent from her rolls.

¹ At Ephrata, Lancaster Co., Penn.

The Moravian Church came among them at a later date, and has since held in their midst much the same place that the Episcopal Church has among the English-speaking Protestants. It, though small in numbers, has probably affected the religious life of America more profoundly, though indirectly, than have the vastly more numerous German Lutheran and Reformed. Bishop Nitschman, in Savannah, became the teacher of the Churchman John Wesley. The Moravian Peter Böhler, as we shall see, gave him that cast of religious life which made him the founder of Methodism. Whitefield was their friend and co-worker. He bought for them five thousand acres of land at the forks of the Delaware to found a school for negroes, which was to be administered by them,¹ and then quarrelled with them and took the land away. But he retained that bias which his intercourse with Peter Böhler had given him, and, during his restless wanderings up and down the colonies, was more under the domination of the Moravian than the English Church.

¹ Reichel: Moravian History, p. 78.

CHAPTER XV.

THE SCOTCH-IRISH.

AT the period of the Reformation England and Scotland were two separate nations, as distinct as the United States and Canada now are. England had through her whole history resisted, and in the end beat off, the aggressions of the Papacy. Scotland had succumbed almost entirely. When the time came, the Reformation had more to do in Scotland, had to do it by a harder battle, against greater odds, in the face of established authorities, religious and secular, and through a far more bitter experience, than fell to the lot of her neighbor. In England the king and officers of state, the bishops and leading clergy, led the movement. In Scotland all these opposed it. In England Episcopacy emerged from the long struggle intact. In Scotland it went down before the people's determination to reform, which purpose the bishops opposed. The Reformed Church of Scotland never forgot that the bishops had joined hands with the Papal enemy.

Wishart and Knox brought into it the Calvinism and Presbyterianism which they had learned at Basle and Frankfort and Geneva in the days of their exile. The twin system of Dogma and Organization struck its roots in the very fabric

England and Scotland at the Reformation.

Calvinism and Presby-terianism.

of the Scottish mind and character. It has lived there a more vigorous and tenacious life than elsewhere in the world. When it had decayed at Geneva it flourished at Edinburgh. When it had become loosened and capable of revision there, it is found in its pristine strength at Pittsburg. When the Protestant Revolution had subsided, Episcopacy had been rooted out in Scotland, and the soil where it had grown sown with the salt of Calvinism. When the two crowns were united in that of James I, there began that long struggle for supremacy between the two peoples whose history had been so diverse. The match was not conspicuously unequal. The advantage which the more numerous population of England gave her was counterbalanced by the profound conviction and fierce tenacity of purpose which marked the Scotch. The stake at issue was the control of the ecclesiastical organization of the United Kingdom. The issue was by no means a foregone conclusion. If the English won when swords and muskets were the weapons, the Scotch knew how to "jouk an' let the jaw go by," and gain their end by cautious and patient diplomacy. Once, at least, they succeeded in having the "Solemn League and Covenant" against prelaey sworn to by monarch and parliament, and Presbyterianism made the law of the land. But the southern half of the kingdom steadily outgrew the northern, and in the long run numbers tell. Presbyterianism was beaten back beyond the border; Episcopacy crossed in pursuit, by the same path upon which the Covenant had once come southward. The ecclesiastical authority of the realm set about to exter-

Presbyterianism and Episcopacy.

minate Presbyterianism, as it, in its turn, had attacked Episcopacy.

In the contest from this time onward the weight of suffering fell upon the Scotch. It was a game of hammer and anvil, and the English wielded the Episcopal rigor. hammer. In the last quarter of the seventeenth century the Scotch Presbyterian's life was a burden to him. "Uniformity" acts, "Test" acts, "Conventicle" acts, entangled him at every turn. It was a felony to worship otherwise than by the Book of Common Prayer, to conduct family worship when more than five beside the household were present, to preach without permission of the bishop, to boggle at abjuring the Covenant which the Presbyterian held sacred, to absent one's self from the parish church. All synods, presbyteries, and sessions were declared illegal. A new hierarchy was set up, with a renegade Presbyterian at its head. Ignorant and godless priests were set in charge of the churches.¹ The laws were enforced by sequestrations, fines, the gaol, the stocks, boot, thumbscrews, pillory, and the gallows. But all in vain. The stern stuff of which Scotch Presbyterianism was made finally prevailed, and the Presbytery became established north of the Tweed.

Meanwhile many to whom life had become intolerable sought refuge in Ireland, then a sort of No-man's-Emigration to Ireland. land. A sheriff's writ could hardly cross the Channel, and the moss troopers were not there to harry them. They were welcomed as thrifty tenants upon the large, half-waste tracts held by English land-owners. But as the civilization of the island increased, its whilom obscurity ceased to shelter them. The same contest of argument and arms between the bishops and the Presbyterians, which had wasted Scotland, sprang up in Ireland. The bitterest theological controversies, diversified by passages at arms, occupied a whole generation. Finally it embittered the relations between land-owning Churchmen and the Presbyterian tenantry. The "Antrim Evictions" left thousands of them without home or shelter. In two years thirty thousand emigrated to America.¹ They found many of their kin already here. The prisoners taken at Dunbar and Bothwell Brig fifty years before had been sold as slaves to the plantations.² Scotch noblemen and gentlemen had bought large lands for their fellow-religionists in South Carolina. There were settlements of them in Virginia and Maryland. But at the opening of the eighteenth century they began to come in like a flood. Boston, Philadelphia, and Charleston were the principal places of entry. Of these, Philadelphia was the favorite. Whole congregations came, bringing their ministers with them. "In the first half of the century, Down, Antrim, Armagh, and Derry were emptied."³ In 1740 the immigration had reached twelve thousand a year to Philadelphia alone.⁴ They halted but a little at the seaboard, but passed at once through the coast settlements, and took possession of the frontier. In the fertile valley of the Mohawk, the rich, rolling

¹ Burnet: History of His Own Time, i. p. 229.

Emigration to America.

¹ Craighead: Scotch and Irish Seeds in American Soil, p. 274.

² Ibid., p. 266.

³ Froude: History of Ireland, vol. i. p. 129.

⁴ Hodge: History of the Presbyterian Church, p. 51.

land of the Susquehanna, the long, trough-like valleys which lie among the eastern ranges of the Alleghanies, in the uplands of Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas, they established their homes. They were a profoundly religious people. With a spirit like, and yet unlike, the Puritan settlers of New England, they have left their impress indelibly upon American religion. The upper-

Hostility to the Church. most feeling in their minds, when they came, was hatred of Episcopacy, whether in its Romish or its English guise. Their fathers had challenged it to mortal combat a century before, and in their own time the battle had gone against them. In the early years of the last century there were Scotch Presbyterians living here whose ears had been cut off by "Kirke's lambs;" whose fathers had been hung before their eyes for attending conventicles; who had worn the boot and thumbkins while Leslie stood by and jeered; who had been hunted away from their burning homes by that polished gentleman and staunch Churchman, John Graham, of Claverhouse; ministers who had been browbeaten by Irish bishops, and denied sympathy even by the gentle Jeremy Taylor,¹ had been turned out of their livings, fined, imprisoned, their ministerial office derided, the children of the marriages they celebrated pronounced bastards. A deep and sullen hatred of the Church which they regarded as the author of their wrongs was part of the furniture which they brought here with them. They were not likely to consider that they themselves were animated by a similar spirit, and, the opportunity being given, would have reversed the parts in the tragedy. In point of fact, the opportunity had not been given, and so things were as they were. The sober judgment of the world is now made up that the Church lost far more than she won by the methods then adopted. The fair-minded and candid Hallam well says, "It was very possible that Episcopacy was of divine institution, but for this institution houses had been burned and fields laid waste, the gospel had been preached in the fields, and its ministers shot at their prayers. It was a religion of the boot and thumbserew, which a good man must be very cold-blooded indeed if he did not hate and reject from the hands which offered it. For, after all, it is much more certain that God abhors cruelty and persecution than it is that He has set up bishops to have a superiority over presbyters."¹

¹ Craighead: p. 225.

A cordon round the Church.

At the end of the period now before us,² the Scotch-Irish had established a cordon in the rear of the Church, whose seat was on the seaboard, reaching from Londonderry in New Hampshire, and following the foot-hills of the Alleghanies, to Georgia. They gave the religious tone to the life which was preparing to start with leaps and bounds across the mighty West. They made the first inroads into the wilderness "over the mountains." They planted in the new settlements the seed of hostility, or, at the best, dislike of the Church and her ways. They repaid with interest the grudge they owed her for her part in their fathers' quarrel.

But at the same time they became, unwittingly, her bulwark against the savage Indians and the Roman Catholic French. In the long and bloody French wars they bore the brunt. Behind the rampart they formed, the Church pursued her course in peace. When she had grown strong enough, in the next century, she moved out side by side with her ancient enemies, whose hostility had then abated, to possess the land of the West. For a while the Presbyterians stood sturdily with the Church against the enthusiasm of the "Great Awakening," and for the high Church and Sacramentarian ideas they had brought with them,¹ but in the end they succumbed to its influence.² From them rather than from the Puritans have come, for example, the popular judgment as to the proper observance of the Lord's Day, and the attitude of the individual Christian towards amusements and recreations. These notions have, in turn, unconsciously and unavoidably affected the practice of Church people in these regards.³ The Church has caught from them also a certain seriousness of religious life and carefulness of personal conduct, for which she owes a debt. On the other hand, this debt has been more than repaid by the company of recruits which they have constantly furnished to her membership. Bishops, priests, and laymen, the roll of whose names would fill a book, have come to the Episcopal Church from conviction of her better ways, who have never lost their kind good-will to their old Presbyterian home.

¹ Constitutional History, vol. iii. p. 435.

² From 1700 to the War of Independence.

¹ The definitions of the Sacraments in the "Confession of Faith" are such as would satisfy the very highest Churchman.

² Briggs: American Presbyterianism, pp. 249, 250, 252.

³ Canon XIV., 1789.

Influence upon the Church.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE METHODISTS.

WE come now to notice the first of American born sects. Heretofore the successive waves of immigration which we have traced, each carried its own type of religion, and threw it down as a deposit. These successive deposits constitute the primary ecclesiastical stratification of American life. Methodism shows itself not as an additional stratum, but as a great geological "fault" or break. As a sect it was organized and began its independent life here. Its growth and spread has probably been more rapid than that of any religious organization within the Christian era. It was launched from the deck of the Church of England. In its first stages its growth was from those who had always called themselves the Church's members. It was built, equipped, and manned by the Church's officers and crew. When it parted from her it bore away a multitude of her company. Methodism began its course in America at precisely that juncture when Episcopacy was at its lowest point, both in efficiency and in the good-will of the people; at the time when the Church's hands were tied most rigidly by the bonds which bound her to the English state. While she was fettered and impotent, Methodism came, "a system energetic, migratory, itinerant, extem-

The first American
sect.

pore, like the population itself,"¹ fitted itself at once to the new condition of things, and started immediately upon its extraordinary growth.

What, then, was Methodism? What is it? How has it affected the Church in America?

To answer the first of these questions, as in the case of Quakerism, the life and spirit of its founder must be examined.

In 1729 thoughtful men in England were seriously alarmed at what seemed likely to prove a permanent Its origin. eclipse of faith.² It appeared as though the power of evil were about to triumph. The light of the Reformation, as they looked back upon it, seemed to them to have been only the flaring up of the torch before going out into darkness. Here and there the godly men who saw the evil of the day drew together in little groups to plan and pray for better things. These little societies were jeered at as "Holy Clubs," "Sacramentarians," the "righteous."³ Such a club existed at Oxford. Half a dozen fellows and undergraduates composed it. Its leading spirits were Charles and John Wesley, two clergymen of the Methodists the first "Ritualists." Church of England. The purpose of the club was the revival of spiritual life in the Church. To this end they observed with the utmost punctiliousness all the Church's rules and precepts. They were all Ritualists.⁴ They were cir-

¹ Stevens: History of American Methodism, p. 22.

² Churchman's Life of Wesley, p. 14.

³ Ib. p. 15.

⁴ "The Oxford Methodists, up to the time of their general dispersion, were all Church of England Ritualists." Tyerman: The Oxford Methodists, p. 5.

cumspect in life, studious, charitable, earnest-minded. Every morning and evening they spent an hour in private prayer. They communicated at Christ Church once a week. Every Wednesday and Friday they fasted till three o'clock.¹ They believed and taught the Real Presence in the Holy Eucharist; used the mixed chalice; the eastward position; held to apostolic succession; baptism by immersion; prayers for the dead; and something which looked like invocation of Saints. They dreamed of a revival of the primitive Church as it was in the days of the fathers. For their punctiliousness they were dubbed "Methodists." The masterful character of John Wesley quickly came to dominate the others. Except for his connection with this Church revival it would probably have been forgotten long ago. The ecclesiasticism of it left its impress upon one side of Wesley's character which it retained all his life; but his following attached itself to him upon another side, which was later to be developed.

When Oglethorpe had marshalled his motley colony for Georgia, he secured Charles Wesley for its chaplain. His brother John determined to go along as a missionary to the Indians in the neighborhood of the new plantation. He was commissioned by the S. P. G. for the work. The expedition to which he was attached landed at Savannah in 1736. The work among the Indians was quickly found to be impracticable, and no serious effort seems to have been made to pursue it. In its default, Wesley became the minister in charge of Christ Church, Savannah.

The Wesleys
in Georgia.

There he began at once to carry into practice his pronounced ideas of church order and discipline. He multiplied services; emphasized the fast and feast days of the Church; refused to allow parents to stand, and insisted that none but communicants could be sponsors; insisted upon baptism by immersion as being the primitive mode; repelled from the Holy Communion all who had not been baptized by an episcopally ordained minister; insisted upon making priestly inquisition into the lives of all who offered to come to the Lord's Table. No place more ill adapted to his rubrical rigor could have been found than the Georgia colony was. He quickly estranged his people by his malapropos zeal. From estrangement, the feeling against him soon passed into active hostility. This was carried to its summit by Wesley's folly in connection with a young woman of his parish. He became enamoured of a Miss Hopke, declared his love, was kindly received, and believed that Miss Hopke had promised to marry him. She, however, thought differently, and married another man. Wesley, instead of pocketing his chagrin like a man, chose to bear himself in the matter like a priest. If he was not the young lady's husband, he was at any rate her spiritual pastor and master. In this latter capacity he determined to discipline her for the affront which she had put upon him as a man. He excommunicated her for the double-dealing which he alleged and believed she had been guilty of in the affair. His conduct in the premises was more than the Savannah people, already irritated against him, could endure.

John Wesley and Miss Hopke.

Miss Hopke's uncle, Mr. Causten, a rich and prominent citizen, and a hot-tempered and vindictive man, took up her quarrel, and led the popular anger against Wesley. The storm was too fierce to stand against. Wesley was compelled to flee. In company with a single friend, he escaped through the swamps, lost his way, lay down exhausted, was resuscitated by the exhibition of a piece of gingerbread which his friend had fortunately carried with him, made his way, more dead than alive, to Beaufort, and sailed away to England.

On his way out to Georgia there had chanced to be a little band of Moravians on the same ship with him.

Wesley had been deeply impressed with the manner and spirit of their religious life. They had seemed to possess a secret of spiritual peace which he had not. They invited him, if ever he should have the opportunity, to visit the home of their Church at Herrnhutt. When he went back to England, having failed to do his work among the Indians, and more than failed with the Savannah whites, disappointed and discredited, he made the intended visit. He found the Moravians to be of his spiritual kin. They recommended him to the friendship of one of their own members, Peter Böhler, then living in London. The mystical, Moravian idea that the religious life is in its essence the consciousness of God's presence in the soul, was not unfamiliar to Wesley. He had striven to realize this communion through Sacraments and observances while he belonged to the "Holy Club." His intimate association with that nonjuring Churchman, William Law, had fixed the

Wesley and the Moravians.

same idea deeper in his mind.¹ But through his intercourse with Böhler² he was led to that great experience which is the key not only to Wesley's work and character, but also to that great fabric which he builded.

Wesley's
"conversion."
He records that on the 24th of May, 1738, while reading Luther's Introduction to the Romans, he was suddenly "converted."

He had been for more than a dozen years a priest and preacher, a missionary and a pastor, but, according to the judgment which he ever afterward adhered to, he had never been a Christian. The absolute necessity of conscious "conversion" became from that time the centre of his system. "By it," he says, "I mean an inward impression of the soul whereby the Spirit of God immediately and directly witnesses to my spirit that I am a child of God."³ He was not the first who believed and taught the same thing, but he was the first who had the power of sustained enthusiasm, the faculty of managing men, the genius for organization, which were able to build up about this central tenet a mighty ecclesiastical empire.

The condition of society which he confronted was one which would have appalled a man not sustained by a Desperate condition of religion in England.

profound belief in God's presence with him. At the middle of the eighteenth century, England touched, probably, the lowest moral and religious point in her history. During more than a century she had been steadily drained of her most vigorous life. The Puritan emigration had carried away tens of thousands of her children whose religion, if hard and gloomy, was at any rate real. The deportation of the Quakers had emptied England of enthusiasm. The old Elizabethan Churchmanship was withdrawn into the secluded haunts of the nonjurors. The most virile and wholesome of her children had long since gone to the New World. What was left was inert, conventional, weak, helpless, like a depleted system, to resist the inroads of miasma. The miasma had Deism. already risen in the form of the cold and barren deism which then possessed the popular mind. Shaftesbury, Bolingbroke, Hume, and Tyndal were the teachers who had the public ear. The sordid, debauching reign of the Georges had been established, and its results had begun to show. The moralities, the very decencies of life, were forgotten. Blasphemy became the mark of a gentleman.¹ To "swear like a lord" was the height of the commoner's ambition. New and strange oaths showed a fertile wit. Gambling was the serious business of the court, and the unconcealed recreation of the people. Hogarth shows the fine gentleman meditating suicide after being ruined at play, and the street gamins playing at chuck-farthing on the flat tombstones of St. Paul's Churchyard. Gin was invented, and the street-signs announced unblushingly, that the passer-by could get "drunk for Lubricity. a penny, drunk, with clean straw, for two-pence." The lubricity of the age matched its frivolity. Most of its literature is now, happily, unreadable. Fielding, Smollett, and Sterne have not been able even by their genius to rescue it from its dirt. In a literature where Tom Jones, Peregrine Pickle, Roderrick Random, and Tristram Shandy are the best, what must the worst be? Montesquieu says of the English of that day, "They have no religion." The age's own judgment of itself appears in the proposal of a parliamentary bill, offered half in jest and wholly in earnest, "that the word not should be struck out where it occurs in the Commandments, and inserted in the Creeds!"

¹ Tyerman: Life of Wesley, vol. i. p. 88.

² Stevens: History of American Methodism, p. 27.

³ Ib. p. 192.

¹ Hore: Eighteen Centuries of the Church in England, p. 455.

Church abuses kept pace with civil ones. A few rich and favored clergy monopolized the livings, and left the mass of the clergy to eke out a miserable livelihood by questionable services to godless patrons,¹ or as "Fleet parsons."² The clergy were held in popular contempt, and were content to be so.³ A mitre was schemed for, bribed for, begged for, without sense of shame.⁴ When obtained it was prized for the earthly honor it brought, and not for the duty it entailed. Bishops visited their dioceses when it comported with their more serious duties at court. A Welsh bishop who held his see for years never saw it in his life. Confirmations, infrequently held, brought together the young people from miles around for a debauch. Thackeray violates no probabilities when he presents the Bishop of Bath and Wells bowing and smirking in the

¹ Abbey and Overton: Church of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. ii. p. 16.

² Ib. ii. p. 19.

³ Ib. ii. p. 20.

⁴ Ib. ii. p. 26.

pump-room before the painted, patched, and powdered old Duchess of Yarmouth, the king's mistress.¹ What was not probable in a church in which the man who "wept over a dead donkey and left his own mother to starve," received preferment for his "Sentimental Traveller"? The Church in that century had great men, great scholars, great bishops, but they pursued their work and lived their lives apart from the people. Warburton, Wake, Bull, Butler, Waterland, and Sherlock have left their mark upon the generations since, but failed to redeem the one in which they lived.² This was the England which the newly converted Wesley and his co-worker Whitefield confronted. What could be done with it? How could it be brought to a sense of God and to righteousness of life?

The purpose they set before themselves was a simple one. It was not to introduce any machinery of moral education or scheme of reformation, but to bring each individual soul into conscious intercourse with God. No project was ever conceived which appeared more Quixotic. But they set about the task, and measurably accomplished it. They began with the most unpromising. They preached to the drunkards, swearers, and harlots of Drury Lane, to the brutalized tin-miners of Cornwall, to the keelmen at Newcastle, to the begrimed colliers in Kingswood and Staffordshire. About Whitefield especially the people crowded by the thousand. Five, ten, twenty, thirty thousand people in ists' purpose.

The Method-

Whitefield the preacher, and Wesley the organizer.

¹ The Virginians.

² Abbey and Overton: vol. ii. p. 54.

a single congregation listened to his marvellous voice. He preached all afternoon, and the people refused to disperse when darkness fell. A friend "held a torch beside him, so that he could see his Bible, and he preached all night; when day broke, ten thousand people were standing and kneeling about him." The "converted" were quickly numbered by the thousand. Charles Wesley, the sweet singer, set their deep emotions to hymns. John Wesley, the born organizer and administrator, gathered together the isolated individuals, set them in "classes," set over each class a "leader," selected earnest and fluent men, and sent them out to travel over "circuits," as Wickliff had done centuries before with his "poor preachers." He at once became the head and centre of the movement, and remained so till it broke out of his hands in America.

It spread in his own lifetime to Scotland, Ireland, the West Indies, France, and to America.

Why did not the Church, to which all the Methodist leaders belonged, take it up and thank God for it? This question has been often asked. The answer is to be found in its central principle of conscious conversion. No bishop or priest could join in the Methodist movement without either openly declaring that he had had the emotional experience demanded as a condition precedent, — a declaration which the majority of Christian men cannot honestly make, — or else openly confessing that he had till that time been outside of the very kingdom of God, — a confession which still fewer will admit.¹

¹ The whole attitude of the Church towards Methodism is set out with most admirable candor and intelligence by Abbey: English Church and Bishops in the Eighteenth Century, vol. i. pp. 288-291.

The movement reached America in 1767. In that year the first Methodist society was collected in New York.¹ The "Great Awakening," which was then at its greatest activity, had prepared the way for it. Jonathan Edwards and John Wesley were at one as to the nature of personal religion; but Edwards was a philosopher, while Wesley was pre-eminently an organizer and a man of affairs. His Methodist machinery took up and moulded the converts of the Edwards movement.

But Methodism had a relation to Episcopacy which the "Great Awakening" had not. Whitefield, who represented Wesley here, was a priest of the Church. Those whom he baptized were made thereby members of the Church of England. The Methodist societies used the Book of Common Prayer in their services, and their people all looked to the Church for the administration of the Sacraments.² Up to this point Methodism was simply a society within the Church. If the Church here had been organized, and possessed bishops who could have ordained ministers fast enough to keep pace with the rapidly multiplying Methodist societies, they would in all probability have remained within her boundaries. Wesley besought Lowth, Bishop of London, to ordain at least two priests who could administer the Sacraments to American Methodists. It is doubtful if any single action of a bishop has ever been more fruitful for evil than his refusal. At the opening of the Revolutionary still within the Church.

Methodists

¹ McMaster: History of the People of United States, vol. i. p. 56.

² Stevens: History of American Methodism, p. 75.

War the Wesleyans had increased to "more than eighty travelling preachers, many local preachers, hundreds of class leaders and exhorters, thousands of members, and ten thousands of regular hearers."¹ These all considered themselves to be within the Church, and were so considered both by Wesley and the clergy here.² But the great spreading branch grew too heavy to be sustained by the slender stem of the American Church. When Wesley despaired of securing clergy from the Bishop of London, in whose jurisdiction the American Methodists were, he sent Coke and Asbury to take over-
The Method-ist "bishops." sight of them as "superintendents." When they came they saw the situation more clearly than their patriarch could see it from beyond the sea. He had constructed a Frankenstein machine, which he was not able single-handed to control. The superintendents were not restrained by the same high Churchmanship which Wesley had always retained side by side with his enthusiasm. They assumed the functions and titles of bishops, organized the scattered societies into the compact empire which Methodism still is, cut the strained ligature which bound it to the Church, started the new sect upon its independent way, and made a new rent in the garment of the Lord. They led out of the Church in America probably one hundred thousand souls. Wesley sat at home and sent out adjurations and anathemas after his recreant superintendents, but it was too late. Their action was irretrievable. By his laying the whole weight of the

¹ Stevens: p. 181.

² Ib. p. 75.

Christian system upon a single point, he had destroyed the "proportion of the Faith." The portion of the Church which depended from that point broke away by its own weight.

The loss has been unspeakable to both sections. The Church in America lost the most active part of its membership at the very time when it was about to need them most. Methodism lost the balanced order, the ethical strenuousness, the broad liberality and wholesome reasonableness, which have through good and evil been the possession of the Church.

The loss by separation.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE EPISCOPATE.

STRICTLY speaking, the Episcopal Church was not present in America as an organized body until after the Revolutionary War. Previous to that time, according to the generally accepted definition, there was here only the material out of which it was afterward to be constructed.

Two fundamentally different theories concerning the nature of the Church are now extant.

The first is the one which is generally entertained in the United States. To a large majority of persons it seems so palpably true and reasonable that its opposite appears grotesque. It is that a church, like a state, is built up from below. The materials from which it is constructed are separate individuals, who have given in their adhesion to Jesus Christ by an avowed act of faith. Having established their Christianity as individuals, each independently of the other, they draw together because they are like-minded, and band themselves into a society which becomes a Church. It is open to them to constitute this society in whatever fashion they see fit. The Holy Scriptures are conceived to be silent upon the whole question of organization, presumably with the intention of leaving men free to follow their own judgments here. The whole power of ecclesiastical government rests upon the consent of the governed. It is a question of votes. By a consensus of opinion and action such a society may make such regulations as it chooses; may be monarchical, republican, or absolute; may ordain such and such kinds of officers as it may determine; may call its officers by any name and may assign to them any duties it will; and may remove and depose them at pleasure. The individuals may construct such an ecclesiastical machine as they think will be most efficient, and then may reasonably expect that the Holy Spirit will lodge in it as its motive power. This is the popular notion and the one generally accepted by Protestantism.

The other theory is that the Church is organized from the summit downward; that the authority which pertains to it, and the grace which flows through it, are things which do not depend upon the votes of its units; that men do not establish their Christianity as isolated souls, but that the Church is concerned even in the original transaction by the individual.¹ They who hold to this theory conceive that the essential features of the Church's structure have been long since settled. Whether they might not be changed under the stress of an absolute necessity, is a question they do not seriously ask. They wait for such a demonstrable necessity to appear, and assert that it never yet has appeared. They declare that "it is evident to all men diligently reading the Holy Scriptures and ancient Authors, that from the Apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church, — Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.”¹ While they do not assert that this arrangement is the result of a categorical command of God, still they hold it to be of so potent obligation that it may not be changed except for weightier reasons than have ever yet appeared. This conception of the Church is of the essence of Episcopacy. Overwhelmed as it is by popular vote in the United States, it still is the belief held and acted upon by five-sixths of the Christian world.

¹ "It [the Holy Spirit] was given corporately, so that they who received it realized at once a unity which preceded any individual action of their own."—Lux Mundi. New York: E. & J. B. Young & Co., 1890, p. 373.

Its acceptance by the members of the English Church in colonial times, put them at an incalculable disadvantage as compared with their fellow-colonists. Practical disadvantage of the Church's theory. The Church was here, as Richard complained that he had been sent into the world, “scarcely half made up.” An Episcopal Church without a Bishop is as a body without a head. The scattered parishes were as the beads of a rosary in which the string is cut, leaving the cross, which should be pendent, to fall helpless upon the ground. At the first settlement of the country the then Bishop of London had chanced to be a stockholder and a member of council in the “Virginia Company.” This fact gave him a vague, advisory oversight of its affairs. His successors for nearly a century followed his example until it became a prescriptive right of that see. Bishop Compton in 1703 had it confirmed to him and his successors by an “Order in Council.”² But the supervision which the Bishop of London could give to churches farther away than the heart of Australia now is, was worth but little.

¹ Prayer-Book: Preface to Ordinal.

² Abbey: English Church and its Bishops, vol. i. p. 82.

No order could be guaranteed. Discipline could not be maintained. Confirmation was a physical impossibility. But it was in regard to ordination that the evil of the situation made itself most keenly felt. Other churches

Ordination and discipline. were here with their complete equipment. When a sufficient number of Presbyterians found themselves living together in a remote settlement, they chose a man for pastor, and at the most he need not leave the colony to find a Presbytery in session who could lay hands on him. If they were Baptists or Independents they chose a man, and either invited two or three neighboring ministers to join with them, or, in default of that, ordained him themselves. When a Quaker meeting grew too large it swarmed like a hive of bees, and the younger swarm set up for itself. The Roman Catholics and the Churchmen were helpless. For a hundred and seventy-five years the Church in America was a Japhet in search of a father. The chapter now before us is the story of the long, wearisome, pitiful, despairing effort to obtain that office without which the Church could not live.

As early as 1638 Archbishop Laud had a plan¹ to send out a bishop to New England who might keep as tight a hand over the Puritans there as he was doing over their brethren at home. But Early efforts to obtain the Episcopate. the triumph of Parliament, the overthrow of the king, and the loss of his own head prevented his carrying it into effect.

During the Commonwealth, of course, nothing could be expected in the colonies from a Church that was at its last gasp at home.

¹ Hawkins: Historical Notices, London, 1845, p. 376.

After the Restoration the Lord Chancellor Clarendon¹ undertook a similar project in Virginia, but a change of ministry and the indifference of the dissolute king brought it to naught.

Tenison and Secker, Archbishops of Canterbury, and Compton, Bishop of London, labored often and vainly to secure the same end.

From this side of the water the cry for a bishop was never silent. We have already noticed the scheme proposed by Chaplain Miller at the time of the English capture of New York. So far as any difficulty from this side was concerned, his plan was entirely feasible. It was to set aside "the king's farm" in New York, for the support of a suffragan of the Bishop of London, who should have jurisdiction in all America.

So soon as the first hardships of settlement were past and the Church really began to grow, the need became imperative.

When Keith and Talbot, the first missionaries of the S. P. G., had completed the tour of investigation which their instructions made their duty, they reported that the primary need was bishops. Talbot writes to the Society, in 1702.² "I don't doubt that some good man with one hundred pounds a year would do the Church more service than with a coach and six a hundred years hence." Two years later he wrote to his friend Keith, "Mr. John Lillingston designs, it seems, to go to England next year. He seems to be the fittest person that America affords for the patent.

The need of it

¹ Hawkins: Historical Notices, p. 376.

² MSS. Letters, vol. xi. p. 335.

office of a suffragan. Several of the clergy, both of this province and of Maryland, have said they would pay their tenths to him as the vice-gerent of my Lord of London, whereby the Bishop of America might have as honorable provision as some in Europe."

In a letter to the secretary of the S. P. G., he speaks with great plainness, urging sharply that when the Apostles heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, they sent Peter and John that they might receive the Holy Ghost, not standing upon any question of salary; that when they heard the Word was preached at Antioch they sent there Paul and Barnabas; that when Paul did only dream that a man wanted him in Macedonia, he went all so fast; — "but here we have been calling these so many years, and you will not hear, or will not answer, which is the same thing." He does not undertake to prophesy, but there is such a thing as the kingdom "being taken away from them who will not use it, and given to them who will!"

A convocation of fourteen clergymen at Burlington, N. J., in 1705, signed a petition to the Archbishop, representing that many Lutheran and Independent Ministers were ready to conform if a Bishop were here to ordain them.¹

In 1709 the officers of the S. P. G. presented a memorial to Queen Anne begging that a colonial bishopric might be endowed out of the proceeds of the lands ceded by the Council of Utrecht,² but the death of the queen put an end to the project.

¹ MSS. Letters, vol. xi. p. 335.

² Abbey: English Church and Bishops, vol. i. p. 87.
Beardsley: Life of Johnson, p. 15.

The same year, Governor Nicholson of Maryland wrote the Archbishop of Canterbury that "unless bishops can be had, the Church will surely decline."

In 1715, the S. P. G. laid before George I. a well-digested scheme for the same purpose. It was proposed The S. P. G.'s plan. that four bishops should be consecrated, one for Barbadoes, one for Jamaica, one to have his seat at Burlington, N. J., and another at Williamsburg, Va. The Northern Diocese was to include all the settlements east of the Delaware, extending to Newfoundland; the Southern Diocese having all west of the Delaware, and reaching to the Spanish possessions. They represented that the college at Williamsburg would provide a place for the one, and that they had purchased, for six hundred pounds, a house and grounds at Burlington for the other. Just then the Scotch rebellion broke out, and the High Church clergy showed so much sympathy for the Stuart line that the King and his minister, Walpole, would hear nothing further about the Church's affairs.¹ With a lingering hope in the ultimate fulfilment of the plan, Bishop Tenison left one thousand pounds in his will for the American part of it.

In 1765 a still more promising plan was devised on this side of the sea. In southern Pennsylvania The Pennsylvania plan. there were rich manors which had been reserved for the Duke of York. They were not occupied by anybody who could show good title. In the Delaware River were also sundry islands, occupied in part by squatters, but which were not included in Penn's grant. These together would provide ample endowment for a bishopric, and their resumption for that purpose would disturb no equities.¹ Nothing came of it.

¹ MSS. Letters, vol. x. p. 28.

Nothing came of the petition in which the clergy of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York all joined.² Nothing came of the appeals of Cutler and Johnson, and the Commissaries, and fifty others who pleaded for the Episcopate. They represented with truth that for the lack of it the Church was falling into disorder and disgrace; that dissenting ministers in plenty were ready to conform, but were not willing to cross the sea for ordination; that of those who had crossed, one-fourth, by actual count, had been lost at sea, captured by pirates, shipwrecked, or died of smallpox in England. But their prayers, joined with those of the officers of the S. P. G., of Tenison, Compton, and Seeker, had been fruitless, — and why? Why was an action apparently so easily done, so desired by the parties concerned, and so essential to the Church's welfare, persistently refused?

The fundamental reason was that same entanglement of Church with State which had nearly choked out all spiritual life. The Church of England, paralyzed by this fatal alliance, had lost the power not only to act but even to think for herself. But even if she had had the power to do her duty to her far-away children, she, for the most part, had neither the knowledge nor the good-will requisite. British ignorance of American affairs is even now a standing jest. That density which cannot perceive an American witticism, which looks for buffalo about the suburbs of New York and wild Indians in the streets of Chicago, two hundred years ago was still more hopeless. The English piqued themselves upon their ignorance and indifference. A few bishops and agents of the S. P. G., and the vulgar merchants of the City, were fairly well informed; but, as a rule, the people gave no thought to the plantations. Especially were they indifferent to matters pertaining to the Church.¹ That sense of personal responsibility for the progress of the body, which marks the membership of a voluntary Church, is not to be expected in an Establishment. In it it is the business of the official class to make plans and execute them. Could Englishmen have realized at all the mighty destiny of the then neglected colonies, they would, of course, have acted differently towards them; but this sort of knowledge is too much to expect of any generation. As the feeling then was, the suggestion of a bishop for the colonies seemed to the ordinary mind the most grotesque of incongruities. It was as though a serious proposal had been made to send a sword of state to the King of the Cannibal Islands, or a coach and six to Prester John. The current conceptions of what a bishop was, and what a "plantation" was, were two notions which would not fit together. A bishop was a dignitary, a peer, a being of exalted state, as much for show as for use, but indispensable to the right constitution of things,—in England. The modern idea of an Apostolic Bishop was not

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa. p. 373.

² Smith: Life of Dr. William Smith, vol. i. p. 270.

The current conception of the Episcopal office.

¹ White: Memoirs, New York, 1880, p. 75.

thinkable. Such a creature had not been seen for so many centuries that his memory had faded out. They were not capable of imagining a bishop who had no connection with the State, no artificial dignity, simply an Apostolic man, going about like Selwyn or Chase, in the humblest guise, without state or ceremonial or guaranteed livelihood even, mindful of his work for Christ and His Church. The officer which the American Church asked was an official which the English Churchmen could not then picture to themselves.

To this difficulty of the understanding, the moral darkness of the eighteenth century added a difficulty of spirit. The great men of the Church were writing books; the little men were scheming for preferment; the mass was careless of the whole matter.¹ Besides this there was the long-continued feeling of distrust of Churchmen, entertained by the civil power.² To the secular official's way of thinking, there were too many bishops already. "Priestcraft" was one of the cries of the day. No action would be permitted, if politicians could help it, which would even seem to be in the interest of the sacerdotal order.

These were the obstacles in the mother country, — ignorance, indifference, prejudice, political entanglements, and secular jealousies. By the time they were in the way of being overcome, a dangerous opposition to Episcopacy had developed in the colonies themselves.³

Fear of the office in the colonies.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Mass. p. 675.

² Abbey and Overton: English Church in Eighteenth Century, vol. i pp. 39, 40.

³ Baird: English Church and its Bishops, vol. i. pp. 35, 36.

³ Baird: Religion in America, p. 182.

The idea of an ultimate separation from England, or, rather, of securing a home rule for the colonies, began to be entertained at a much earlier date than is generally supposed.¹ Indeed it was present to some minds from the very first. It was openly charged against the colonies, during the long contests over their charters, that their purpose was to break away entirely from English authority. It cannot be said that this was their purpose in the way of being before their minds in the shape of a definite design; but it was in the form of a dream which many loved to entertain. In truth the war for independence became a future certainty the day the first permanent settlement was made. The necessity was in the situation. Some saw it early; some saw it clearly; but all felt it instinctively. Out of this instinct arose the strenuous opposition which the great body of colonists showed to the introduction of the Episcopate. It commenced to manifest itself as soon as the dream of ultimate separation began to be clearly defined, and continued until separation became a fact, when it suddenly ceased.

The ground of the opposition was twofold, political and ecclesiastical. In form the long controversy was a discussion concerning the right and scriptural organization of the Church; but in spirit it was a political contest. "The whole body of the Puritans were determined to resist the introduction of bishops into America. They feared lest these might use all the authority of the Crown to destroy Puritanism and establish Prelacy."¹ The primary objection to bishops was that they were officers of the Crown; opposition to them as being officials unknown to Scripture and the primitive Church was an after-thought. No question was discussed in colonial times which so seriously enlisted the interest of the people as did this one. The controversy raged intermittently for seventy years. Checkly, Johnson, Beach, Apthorp, and Chandler maintained the Church's side.² They were answered by Dickinson, Mayhew, Chauncey, and a hundred others, from the Dissenters' standpoint. Pamphlets, broadsides, letters, newspaper skits, "Questions Stated," "Replies to Questions Stated," and "Answers to Replies to Questions Stated," kept the printers busy for years.

¹ Sabine: Loyalists of the American Revolution, vol. i. p. 65.

¹ Abbey: English Church and Bishops, vol. i. p. 88.

¹ Caswall: The American Church and the American Union, p. 73.

It is much the custom for Church writers to assume that the opposition to the Episcopate was but the outcome of the wanton and gratuitous enmity of those who hated the Church. Both charity and fact condemn this assumption. The situation being what it then was, there was good and substantial ground for opposition.

The fundamental political question which was opened when the original charters were withdrawn, and which remained open till the Revolution, was: What is the legal status of the colonies?³ Were they an integral part of the kingdom?

The legal status of the colonies.

¹ Briggs: American Presbyterianism, p. 143.

² White: Memoirs, p. 73.

³ Smith: History of New York, pp. 220-228.

³ Sabine: Loyalists of the Revolution, vol. i. p. 24.

³ McMaster: History of the United States, vol. i. p. 33.

Or did their charters give them an autonomy? These two contentions were the opposite poles of the dispute. If the former were the true principle, then English law and custom were of obligation at every point where they were not estopped by the distinct provision of a charter. Now the Church Establishment was part and parcel of the English law. It was seriously contended that it was ipso facto established here also; "that the constitutional laws of the mother country, antecedent to the legislatures of our own, are binding upon us; and therefore at the planting of the colony the English religious Establishment immediately took place; secondly, that the Act which established the Episcopal Church in South Britain, previous to the union of England and Scotland, extended to and equally affected all the colonies."¹ If this contention of Churchmen were well founded, then bishops, if they came here at all, would come with the whole power of English law behind them. No matter what assurances they might give that they had only spiritual purposes in view, they would still be invested with secular powers which they could not renounce if they wanted to; and human nature being what it is, they could not be trusted to confine themselves to spiritual weapons while they would have such potent secular ones ready to hand.

John Adams's opinion. "If Parliament can tax us," says John Adams, "they can establish the Church of England with all its creeds, articles, tests, ceremonies, and tithes, and prohibit all other Churches as conventicles and schism shops."² Adams was clearly right; at any rate he expressed the honest belief of the great majority on both sides of the question. Dr. Chandler's sincerity is not to be questioned when he asserted that "the bishops proposed were to have no temporal power, no maintenance from the colonies, to be confined to the exercise of their spiritual functions only."¹ This was all very well, but who was to guarantee that the bishops, if they came, would take the same view of the case? And if they should take a different view, what, upon the Tory theory of the political status, was to hinder them from carrying it out to the discomfiture of dissenters? The Episcopal advocates themselves let out unconsciously that the bishop they had in mind was not just the meek and apostolic creature described. Every scheme proposed began with a "sufficient provision for his dignified maintenance." The power which he would be to allay political disaffection, is constantly dwelt upon in the letters of the Venerable Society's missionaries.² "The King is thoroughly sensible that the Episcopalians are his best friends."³ The clergy here were careful to sustain this conviction of the King. The people generally knew this to be the case. They feared, and under the circumstances had reason to fear, the consequences which might flow from allowing the Church to set up her powerful machinery here in its entirety. This apprehension was not confined to dissenters or even Church laymen. In 1771, only twelve out of the one hundred clergy in Virginia joined in well founded.

¹ Smith: History of New York, p. 220.

² John Adams: Works, vol. x. p. 287.

Fear of the Episcopate

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 73.

² Perry: Historical Collections, passim.

³ Abbey: English Church and Bishops, vol. i. p. 364.

a petition to the Crown for an American bishop. A larger convention than the one which adopted the measure rejected it, and four of them sent their protest against it to the Virginia House of Burgesses, — almost all of which were Churchmen, — and received the formal thanks of the House for their patriotic action.¹ Few clergy indeed sympathized with these four, but the significant thing is that there were any such.

The truth would seem to be, that in the face of the dissenting opposition, the support which the opposition received from the dissenters and the colonial agents in England, the indifference of the American laity, the apathy of the English clergy, and the impotence of the bishops who moved in the matter, there was no time, from the opening of the eighteenth century till the close of the Revolution, when it would have been possible to have a bishop consecrated for America.²

This was the judgment to which the clergy themselves reluctantly came.³ Some among them despaired entirely. Some began to turn their thoughts elsewhere — to the Swedish or Moravian Church. Not a few of the clergy in the Middle and Southern colonies entertained the idea of an “Independent Episcopal Church.” Dr. Smith wrote to the Bishop of London in 1776, “The rest are a mixed sort, chiefly for an Independent Church of England — a strange sort of church indeed! But the notion gains too much ground here even among the clergy. I believe Bishops impossible till after the Revolution.

Idea of an “Independent Church.”

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 76.

² White: Memoirs, p. 75.

³ Smith: Life of Dr. Smith, vol. i. p. 387.

your lordship will perceive something of this sort not altogether pleasing if the resolves of a majority of the last Jersey Convention come before you, against commissaries, and preferring thereto a kind of presbyterian or synodical self-delegated government by conventions.”¹ This idea was developed by Dr. White of Philadelphia, in 1782, in his celebrated pamphlet, “The Case of the Episcopal Churches Considered.”² Dr. White did not speak for himself alone, by any means, when he proposed his plan. His scheme assumed that the hope of obtaining the Episcopate from England had been demonstrated to be impossible, and had been abandoned. In that case there seemed to him to remain but the alternatives of permanent anarchy, or such an organization as could be made out of the materials present. He proposed that (a) the clergy and lay delegates from the parishes, in definite districts to be defined, should combine in an organization which might be called a Diocese or a Synod or what not; (b) that these organizations should, at the outset, record their attachment to Episcopacy, and their determination to secure it when God should open the way thereto; (c) that, meanwhile, the Church should proceed in presbyterian fashion, inasmuch as the Church contemplated would only possess presbyters. He justified his proposal by the plea of imperious necessity; and by the fact that the Church of England had never denied the validity of non-Episcopal orders, and had recognized them under a less exigent need.³

¹ Smith: Life of Dr. Smith, vol. i. p. 401.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa. p. 414.

² White: Memoirs, p. 99.

³ White: Memoirs, p. 101, note.

The popular judgment concerning the matter was fairly stated by Benjamin Franklin, who expressed his amazement that devout and learned men who were fully qualified to instruct and pray for their neighbors should hesitate to do so without taking the pains to cross the sea for the purpose of securing "the permission of a cross old gentleman at Canterbury."¹

But whatever might be the theories held as to the succedaneums proposed, the fact was patent that the question of the Episcopate was involved in the deeper question of the legal position of the colonies, and that that question could only be decided by the stern arbitrament of the sword.

¹ McMaster: History of the United States, vol. i. p. 232.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A SURVEY.

IT is not easy to reproduce a picture of a past time, but it will be of interest to pause here to take a broad view of the condition of the Colonial Church at the period immediately preceding the War of Independence.

It had then extended from the chief towns and settlements on the seaboard, where it had first gained a lodgment, to the new places of the second rank.
 Spread of the Church. At the opening of the century it had been found only at such places as Boston, Newport, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, and on the Virginia coast. Now there were parishes at Falmouth and Casco, besides the old one at Portsmouth; at Salem, Dedham, Marblehead, in Massachusetts; at Bristol, R. I., and New-England towns of a similar class. When New Hampshire, with its territorial appendage Vermont, had a Churchman for its governor at the middle of the century, it was determined to endow the Church from its public lands. A half-section in each township in Vermont was set apart for this purpose, but the people from whom the surveyors were taken being hostile, the sections were located in swamps, on mountain tops, and in the bottoms of lakes, so that but little else came of it than came of all similar attempts; that is, the ill-will of the people and small gain to the Church.¹ In Connecticut alone can it be said that striking success had been achieved. The drift toward the Church of England, which began with the President of Yale College and his colleagues, had steadily spread. The people came in in large numbers.² There was to be found there a native-born clergy, of a far higher character and education, and with more intelligent and pronounced views concerning the Church, than was the rule elsewhere. Even after the war, during which the Church had been torn to pieces and hundreds had moved away, there were still to be found twenty and forty thousand Church people in that colony.³ In it there had never been any of those impotent attempts at legal coercion which the Church essayed elsewhere. There was no bad blood, no memories of legal violence.

There was a fair parish at the Dutch town of Albany, little churches at Rye, Jamaica, Hempstead, and on Staten Island,⁴ beside the strong and growing Church in New York. In that province the Episcopalians were reckoned at about one-fifteenth of the population.⁵ Burlington, N. J., was one of the centres of Church life, and the seat of one of the proposed bishoprics. In Pennsylvania missions had pushed as far west as Lancaster, and even Carlisle, with the nucleus of a parish on the Juniata. In the South there had been a distinct retro-

In New York.

New Jersey and Pennsylv-vania.

¹ Caswall: American Church and American Union, p. 73.

² Beardsley: History of the Church in Connecticut, vol. i. passim.

³ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 137.

⁴ Smith: History of New York.

⁴ Briggs: American Presbyterianism, p. 109.

⁵ Smith: History of New York, p. 218.

gression.¹ Even in faithful old Virginia dissenters were two to one.² The results of the fatal breach between clergy and people had already appeared there. Religious indifference prevailed everywhere; churches were falling into neglect and ruin; many of the clergy had withdrawn; still more could have done so to advantage; the few faithful men who remained lamented and despaired.³ Further south the condition was scarcely better. There were two churches in Charleston, — an increase of one in eighty years, — and six meeting-houses.⁴ But the clergy of South Carolina were, as a rule, zealous men, and had the great advantage of being able generally to take the side of their people against England.⁵

All the parishes from Maine to Georgia belonged to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London. Except in Virginia and Maryland the clergy were practically all missionaries of the “British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.”

The conversion of the native Indians, which had been so prominent in the early plans of the Church, had almost entirely failed and been abandoned. In the South, where the promise for this work had once been best, it had gradually died away as negro slavery became more and more firmly established. The low estimate of the intrinsic value of a human being which slavery unconsciously creates, had operated to

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. pp. 141-143.

² Lodge: History of the Colonies, p. 57.

³ Ib. p. 58.

⁴ Ib. p. 176.

⁵ Ib. p. 176.

put an end to missionary work among savages. In the North a struggling mission was still maintained among the Mohawks,¹ but it, too, was soon to be swept away by the imminent war. Speaking broadly, there cannot be said to have been any permanent work of any church effected among the Indians until they had become so surrounded and hemmed in by the white population that their restless savagery was to a degree restrained. The success was earliest and most marked among those tribes which were already partly civilized and fixed in their habitat when the whites first saw them.² At the period before us they had only just laid down the tomahawk and butcher-knife, which they had carried for so long at the instigation of the French, and were about to take them up again in the pay of the English. By the colonists they were feared and loathed as monsters compounded of wolf and fiend.

The Church growth was very unequal in different localities. The accession from Quakers in Pennsylvania, which had set in at a very early period, still continued. The reports of the missionaries in the outlying counties constantly record the baptism of these people and their children. The rapid growth in Connecticut has been already noticed. In New York and New Jersey the great gain was from the Dutch. The hereditary enmities which separated other Presbyterians from the Church did not operate among them. There had been differences, of course, but there was no deep-seated rancor on either hand. They deeply gain.

Sources of

¹ Perry: History, vol. i. p. 333.

² Parkman: Discovery of the Great West, p. 275.

³ Liggins: Value and Success of Foreign Missions, p. 157.

sympathized with the Church in one important particular; they also felt bound to cross the sea for ordination.¹ When a schism was effected among themselves upon this question, and an "American Dutch Church" was set up,² many of the dissatisfied on either hand came to the English Church. But the most active cause was the stolid tenacity with which they held on to the Dutch tongue in their public worship, long after their children and youth had ceased to be at home in it. These became restive and came numerous to the Church, where they could hear English spoken. When the elders did bring themselves to give up their Dutch, it was too late; their children had become Episcopalians.³

In Philadelphia the Dutch congregation offered to come over in a body if the Bishop of London would ordain their minister.

The Lutheran Coetus in Pennsylvania made the same proposition, and the Swedish Commissary offered to lead the movement, and to conduct the negotiations between the two Churches, in both of which his own ministry was recognized.⁴ Had there been a bishop resident there is every reason to believe that a permanent coalescence might have been effected between both

¹ Gunn: Memoirs of Dr. Livingston, New York, 1829, pp. 92, 93.

² Ib. p. 94.

³ A Mr. Livingston, a member of the Dutch Church, writes in 1770: "Had this been done thirty years ago the Dutch Congregation would have been much more numerous than it is now. The greatest part of the Episcopal Church consists of the accessions they have had from the Dutch Church." And he adds that though Dutch was his own mother tongue, he could not understand a sermon half so well in it as he could in English; and as for his children, "there was not one that understood a sentence in Dutch." Memoirs of Dr. Livingston, p. 108.

⁴ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa., pp. 367, 396, 432.

these bodies and this Church, as could also have been done with the Methodists ten years later.

The constant complaint of the time was that there were not enough clergy to go in and possess the places which offered. Young men thought twice before they ventured upon the dangers of shipwreck and smallpox, as well as the great expense, which were involved in a journey to England for ordination.¹

With the meagre means at her hand the Church had done much in the way of education, but at the date before us was being left behind in this race by the other churches. The institutions now known as Columbia College and the University of Pennsylvania had both been established under Church auspices, and in both instances had for their primary object to increase the ministry.² They had clergymen for their organizers and first presidents, but as the political issue grew more clearly pronounced they passed more and more out from under Episcopal influence.

The Church life was affected, as it always is, by the prevailing moral habits of the age. Public and private morals never reached so low an ebb in the colonies as they did in the mother country; but still they were low enough. The Deism and its attendant loosening of moral sanctions, which dominated the popular life of England, affected America also. Tom Paine, the most effective writer on the Colonial side of the political issue, gained in that way the popularity which made his cheap and taking infidelity spread among the people. It never ran into that superfluity of naughtiness which forms so strange a chapter in the history of modern England, but rather produced a low standard of righteousness, and a sordid manner of life.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa., p. 434 passim.

² Perry: History, vol. i. ch. xxxiii.

The typical man of his time was Benjamin Franklin. He had been longer known and exercised more influence in every department of life than any other man in America. Upon the moral and religious side this influence was wholly bad. His autobiography showed that the gross offences of his own early life were repented of, not because they had been sinful, but because they had been foolish. They were to be avoided by other young men, not because they were hateful to God and left stains upon the soul, but because they hindered earthly success. The mean and cautious maxims of Poor Richard "passed into the daily speech of the people, were quoted in sermons, were printed on the title-pages of pamphlets, and used as matter by the newspaper moralists of the day, and continued to be read with avidity even down to the Revolution."¹ They contain no high or noble motive. They are all the maxims of a selfish man, and all such as might be kept with ease by an impure man. They tended to dry up the springs of religion. As the thoughts of a man who was rather non-religious than irreligious, they fairly reflect the spirit of a non-religious age. Franklin was the representative man of his generation. Unquestionably great

Influence of Benjamin Franklin.

¹ McMaster: Life of Benjamin Franklin, p. 113.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

in science, in statesmanship, in diplomacy and affairs, he was utterly incapable of understanding things which the world has always deemed of prime importance. Nominally a Churchman, he poked fun at those who sought the Episcopate. A man of letters, he produced a paraphrase of the Book of Job which he considered to be better English than King James's translation,¹ and made a Prayer-Book² which could only be of use to such as had no sense of devotion. But his age was like him, and he had largely made it so, in its lack of spiritual earnestness.

It is difficult now to conceive how coarse and cruel life in America was a century ago. "Redemptioners"

¹ KING JAMES'S.

Verse 6. Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also amongst them.

7. And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord and said, From going to and fro in the earth and from walking up and down in it.

8. And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil?

9. And Satan answered the Lord and said, Doth Job fear God for naught?

FRANKLIN.

Verse 6. And it being levee day in Heaven, all God's nobility came to court to present themselves before him; and Satan also appeared in the circle, as one of the ministry.

7. And God said unto Satan, You have been some time absent; where were you? And Satan answered, I have been at my country seat, and in different places visiting my friends.

8. And God said, Well, what think you of Lord Job? You see he is my best friend, a perfectly honest man, full of respect for me, and avoiding everything that might offend me.

9. And Satan answered, Does your majesty imagine that his good conduct is the effect of personal attachment and affection? — McMASTER: Benjamin Franklin, p. 87.

² Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 243.

and apprentices went half clad, slept in garrets, ate cold meat in the kitchen, and were acquainted with the cudgel. The man who was unfortunate enough to owe a few dollars was sent to a gaol so vile that it cannot here be even described. Prisoners for debt and for crime were herded together as regardless of sex as if they had been so many beasts. Even in Connecticut, convicts were confined in an underground cave, reeking with filth, chained by the neck to iron bars. In Massachusetts ten crimes, and in Delaware twenty, were punishable by death. The whole machinery of reform and the administration of charity with which the Church is identified now, was wanting. Soldiers and sailors were flogged half to death for petty offences. The stocks, the pillory, and the whipping-post stood in the public square, and their victims were pelted by the rabble. A public hanging would draw a crowd from miles around. Women who had been convicted of larceny were carted down Broadway to the whipping-post, and received thirty-nine lashes each.¹ The year the Revolutionary War began, two men were burned at the stake at Poughkeepsie, for arson.² Within thirty years of the same date, men had been burned, hung alive in chains, and broken on the wheel, in New York.³ Education was general among the better classes in the North, but in the South it was neither possessed nor desired. There, but few gentlemen were able to write an intelligent letter,⁴ and the common people could neither read nor write at all.

¹ Lodge: History of English Colonies, p. 324.

² Ib. p. 324.

³ Ib. p. 322.

⁴ Ib. p. 75.

Social distinctions were sharply drawn. Rights of precedence were as strenuously insisted upon as at the French Court. The "quality" were clearly marked off from the common folk. In the New England meeting-houses it was still the custom to "dignify the congregation." Grave and discreet persons assigned pews to the families according to their standing and position. While this was not done formally in the parishes of the Church of England, it still was substantially. In point of fact, the Church was confined to the aristocracy either of education or of position. In New England it was the former, in the other colonies the latter.¹ It contained the frequenters of the provincial governor's mimic court, the county families in Virginia and Maryland, the collectors of the ports, the great merchants, the judges and lawyers, the refined, cultivated, and fashionable.

The church buildings — where they possessed any architectural style at all — were of the petty elaborateness of Sir Christopher Wren. Himself the son of a clergyman and the grandson of a bishop, he had set his mark upon church architecture, which it retained in America long after it had been outgrown in England. In a collected group of his English parish churches, one can see whence came the New-England meeting-house and the colonial church.²

The services were what would now be deemed intolerably bare, cold, and lifeless. The surplice was rarely used. There were probably not above a score in America.

¹ Perry: History, vol. i. p. 446.

Geo. C. Mason, architect: in Lippincott's Magazine, Nov. 1885.

The "gown and bands" was the usual vestment. The "clerk," from his stall below the reading-desk, made the responses, and announced the hymns,¹ with the formula "Let us sing to the praise and glory of God." The congregation sat while singing;² when the custom of standing was introduced in 1814, it was considered a portentous ritual innovation, requiring action by the House of Bishops.³ At the Prayers it was not the custom for any but communicants to kneel,⁴ the others sitting in a respectful attitude. The Holy Communion was celebrated quarterly, or, in a very few places, monthly; and the proportion of communicants to the congregation was very small.

Confirmation, of course, could not be had, and the nature and purpose of the rite had well-nigh been forgotten. Bishop White was never confirmed at all,⁵ and it is doubtful if Bishop Seabury was.⁶

¹ Ayres: Life of Dr. Muhlenberg, pp. 46, 47.

² White: Memoirs, p. 39.

³ Perry: Half-Century of Legislation, p. 434.

⁴ Ayres: Life of Dr. Muhlenberg, p. 25.

⁵ Dr. Muhlenberg says: "We recollect distinctly Bishop White telling us that he had never been confirmed, and his adding, moreover, that the English bishops were not in the practice of confirming those who came over from this country for ordination." Ayres: Life of Dr. Muhlenberg, p. 50.

⁶ Dr. Beardsley, whose opinion must always carry weight, insists strenuously that Bishop Seabury must have been confirmed, because of the stress he always laid upon the rite after he became a bishop himself. This a priori argument, however, hardly overcomes the facts: first, that there is no record of or allusion to his confirmation; and second, that the bishop who ordained him was the most unlikely of all to insist upon a neglected ordinance.

"Thomas of Lincoln is spoken of as a worthy man, but too fond of the company of people of rank, and sadly forgetful of his promises. He squinted terribly, and was very deaf; but his never-failing humor and facetiousness made him an amusing companion. George II. delighted in his society, and brought him over, with promises of promotion, from his chaplaincy in Hamburg." Abbey: English Church and its Bishops, vol. ii. p. 75.

A favorite mode of raising the money to build churches was by lotteries, which were conducted under State control.¹ The clergy were never spoken of as "priests," but always as clergymen or ministers, and, if the order was meant to be designated, as Presbyters or Deacons. Their stipends were, for the most part, painfully meagre. Probably there were not more than five which reached one hundred and fifty pounds a year. The minister at Lancaster, Pa., complains that he cannot possibly support himself and family of eleven persons on less than one hundred pounds annually.² To take away from such ill-paid clergy, in part, at least, their cruel anxiety for the future of their families, a society had been formed in 1769, called, in the long-winded fashion of the time, "The Corporation for the Relief of Widows and Children of Clergymen in the Communion of the Church of England in America."³ At the outbreak of the war the society already possessed a fund of nearly fifteen thousand pounds. When the war had ended, this society became the meeting-place of the scattered parishes, and the rallying-point for the disorganized Church.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa. pp. 374, 376.

² Ib. p. 371.

³ Perry: History, vol. i. p. 647, where an excellent sketch of this noble charity is given by the late John William Wallace, LL.D.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE.

IN 1765 the treaty which shut the French out of North America was signed by England and France. "Well," said the French minister as he signed it, "so we are gone; England will go next." His prophecy was quite correct. It had been fear of the French and their savage allies on the western frontier that kept the colonies from bringing their differences with England to a settlement long ago. Now that danger was gone. Before that they had two foes to consider, now they had but one. The questions at issue were fundamental.

The inevitable conflict. The war of the Revolution, like that of the Great Rebellion, was one of the inevitables. The social, the political, and, above all, the commercial interests of the two countries, were radically opposed. Absolute submission, peaceable separation, or fight, were the only alternatives. Men shut their eyes to the situation, and sought diligently for some fourth course, but there was none. In ten years from the French peace the issue was made up. Virginia and Massachusetts, the two oldest colonies, where the seeds of strife had had longest time to grow and ripen, led the American side.

Though the issue seems simple now, in the light of its result, it did not seem so then. The populace divided itself roughly into three classes. First, the great mass of the people, who were inert, apathetic, dreaded the possible calamity of war, and hoped that somebody would hit upon a way of adjusting the difficulties peaceably. Second, the small party of ultra "Tories," who could not conceive of opposition to the powers that be, and looked for relief from the clemency of the king. Third, the small party of patriots who looked forward to, and through, the coming struggle, and burned to have the question settled, by peaceable measures if possible, by war if need be.

But in such cases events move rapidly, and precipitate popular judgment. As men's passions grew more Equal division of parties. and more engaged, these two parties made forays upon the passive mass, and bore away recruits into either camp. When the two ultimate parties were finally made up they were nearly equally balanced, and remained so until the fortunes of war weakened the Tory side. Even in Massachusetts a majority were at first opposed to the war. The bill which gave it sanction was twice defeated by the Legislature before it was finally passed. In Connecticut the opposition was still more numerous.¹ In New York the parties were so equally divided that when the Provincial Congress chanced to receive notices upon the same day, in 1775, that General Washington was about to cross the Hudson on his way to the headquarters at Cambridge, and that General Tryon had arrived in the harbor and was about to disembark, they ordered the colonel commanding the militia so to dispose of his forces that he could receive "either the General or Governor Tryon, whichever should first arrive, and wait upon them both as well as circumstances would allow."¹ In the far South the situation was the same. The South Carolina patriots and Tories were equally matched in numbers, and drifted into a savage enmity against each other, which was marked throughout the war by atrocities in which each side outdid the other.² In the early years of the war, as many as forty thousand Tories enlisted in the king's forces.³ But a far larger number, unable to stem the popular current, and finding their lives in the colonies intolerable, left the country. They went back to England, emigrated to Canada, to Nova Scotia, to the Barbadoes, and to the Spanish settlements. Eleven hundred left Boston in a single day.⁴ They included all classes of people, — members of the council, merchants, clergymen, farmers, mechanics, traders. The mother and sister of Gouverneur Morris took the Tory side, and left the country. Ten thousand left New York alone at the time of its evacuation. Those who remained were roughly handled. They became the target of all popular abuse, were lampooned, defrauded of their debts, mobbed, shot at from thickets, tarred and feathered, smothered in smoke-houses like fitches of bacon, had their cattle killed and their houses burned, — and, where they had the opportunity, retaliated in kind.

¹ Sabine: Loyalists in the American Revolution, vol. i. p. 27.

The significant thing to us is that, as a rule, they were Episcopalians. The Presbyterians and Baptists in the

¹ Sparks: Life of Washington.

² Sabine: Loyalists, vol. i. p. 42.

² Roosevelt: Winning of the West, vol. ii. ch. ix.

³ Sabine: Loyalists, vol. i. p. 71.

⁴ Ib., vol. i. p. 25.

Southern, and, with but few exceptions,¹ the Puritans in the Eastern colonies, threw themselves with enthusiasm into the quarrel, on the American side.² The position of the Churchmen was perplexing. They were more closely bound to England than were their dissenting fellow-citizens. A large proportion of the laity, and almost the whole of the clergy, remained steadfast in their allegiance to the Crown until the end. But the situations of the laity and the clergy were not the same. The layman was attached to the English Church only on its spiritual, and not its secular side. The clergyman was bound by a double bond. Laymen whose political beliefs led them that way could at the same time say their prayers from the Prayer-Book and fight against the king. They violated no sanction of conscience or previous obligation in so doing. From this class came an extraordinary proportion of the leaders of the Revolution. Washington and Patrick Henry were devout communicants. Franklin was a Churchman, so far as he had any religion at all. The Morrises, Livingston, Sterling, Jay, Richard Henry Lee, Madison, Morgan, the Pendletons, and the Pinckneys, are but examples of the men whom the Church contributed to the American side.

But the position of the clergy was vastly different. In the first place, a large proportion were English by birth and education. Nearly all, except in Virginia and Maryland, were missionaries of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in For-

Lay Churchmen's position.

Situation of the clergy.

¹ Like Dr. Byles, for example.

² Baird: Religion in America, p. 215.

eight Parts." Their livelihood was at stake. At any sign of "disloyalty" their stipends would be cut off,¹ and starvation would confront them. But, above all, each one, at his ordination, had definitely sworn perpetual allegiance to the king. This oath was the insuperable difficulty. It was recorded with the Bishop of London, and also in their own consciences. A very small class, insignificant in number but great in character and influence, believed themselves to have been absolved by the authority of circumstances. They reasoned with themselves that the ordination oath of allegiance to the king was but the historic declaration that priests must be obedient and docile citizens; that it did not mean literally to King George, but to the "powers that be," for which the king there stood; that when those powers were transferred, by forces with which they had nothing to do, to another rule under which they found themselves living, their allegiance was due to the new authority. They argued that the situation here was the same that had been in England at the Revolution of 1688. The great mass of the bishops and clergy had then transferred their allegiance from the de jure to the de facto king. Why should they not make a similar transfer of obedience to the Republic?

Being thus convinced, sturdy Dr. Muhlenberg accepted his colonel's commission, donned his new uniform, put on his gown over it, preached an earnest sermon to his thronged congregation upon the duty of the hour; then laid his gown over the reading-clergy.

Patriot

¹ Perry: Historical Collections. vol. Mass. pp. 602, 609.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 13.

desk, marched out of church, stood at the door with a recruiting sergeant's roll in hand, and enlisted a whole battalion of Continental troops on the spot.¹ Dr. White of Philadelphia became Chaplain of the Continental Congress, and never deviated from the patriotic choice he had made. Dr. Prövoost of New York was so uncompromising a patriot that he could not bring himself, in after days, to forgive the Tory Bishop Seabury. But this sentiment was confined almost entirely to the clergy of the middle colonies. It found its formal expression in a letter to the Bishop of London in 1775, in which the clergy declare that "the people will feel and judge for themselves in matters affecting their own civil happiness; and were we capable of any attempt which might have the appearance of drawing them to what they think would be a slavish resignation of their rights, it would be destructive of ourselves, as well as the Church of which we are ministers. It is but justice to our superiors, and your Lordship in particular, to declare that our consciences would not permit us to injure the rights of this country, in which we are to leave our families."²

But the majority of the clergy could not look at the case after this fashion. They could not lift the obligation of the ordination oath off their consciences even if they had wished, — and they did not wish. They were quite ready to join in any respectful address to Great Britain for a redress of the colonial clergy.

Loyalist

¹ Ayres: Life of Dr. Muhlenberg, p. 4.

² Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa. p. 472.

*The signers were Richard Peters, William Smith, Jacob Duché, Thomas Coombe, William Stringer, and William White.

grievances, but in their hearts they did not regard these grievances as being so very intolerable, after all. They looked at the situation with English eyes. They fondly hoped for, and urged, some amicable settlement of the contest. If no such settlement could be reached, then the same authority which taught them to fear God also bade them to "honor the king." Seabury and Inglis could not quiet their consciences by what they thought the shallow casuistry of White and Provoost. Above all things, they prayed to be delivered from being compelled to choose sides in the issue now joined. But this could not be. Congress appointed July 20, 1775, for a day of fasting and prayer, and called upon all Christians to assemble at their accustomed places of worship. The Church clergy were forced into a corner. To disregard the proclamation entirely would openly fix them in the opposition. To publicly pray for the success of the king and royal arms would be too much to venture. Pray against them they could not. But they must call the congregation together and have a service of some sort. Some said they were entirely ready to do so, for surely never were times when fasting and prayer were more needed. All but four of the clergy in the country, of whom Dr. Seabury was one, opened their churches.¹ But their real sentiments came out in their sermons. The burden of them was compromise. If that could not be done, then, it was intimated rather than said, submission would be the duty.

The popular indignation was profound. Laymen declared that the clergy did not voice the real feeling of Churchmen. Newspapers reviled them as Tories, traitors, and British emissaries. "No more passive obedience," was chalked upon the church-doors.¹ One minister writes to England: "It is urged as a just cause of complaint against one of the militia captains, that he had lugged his company to church on a fast day, to hear that old wretch (meaning me!) preach, who was always an enemy to the present measures."² The Episcopal clergy stood condemned in the eyes of the party who were to carry through the War for Independence and build the Republic. The sentence was harshly carried into execution. The Connecticut clergy assembled at New Haven and determined to suspend all public services, and wait for better times.³ Those of New York retired to the seclusion of private life, exiled themselves to Nova Scotia, or moved within the British lines. Dr. Seabury became chaplain to a regiment of British infantry. The Church in Virginia was formally disestablished by the colonial government.⁴ But neither seclusion, insignificance, nor high character was able to save the clergy from the fury of the populace. Their churches were wrecked, defiled, and burned. Their property was confiscated. Their cattle were killed. They were hooted, pelted, arrested, imprisoned, ducked in the pond, shot at, starved, and banished. The baneful old alliance of the Church with the State here produced its inevitable result. The Church, which in itself was not disliked

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa. p. 479.

Sufferings of the clergy.

¹ Perry: Historical Collections, vol. Pa. p. 481.

² Ib.: vol. Pa. p. 481.

³ Beardsley: History of the Church in Conn., vol. i. p. 318.

⁴ Baird: Religion in America, p. 220.

by Americans, was wrecked because its fortunes were bound to a State which they hated.¹

¹ The following partial list, compiled chiefly from Sabine's "Loyalists in the Revolution," will give an idea of the way the Church was devastated during the war:—

Rev. Mr. Adams, York, Pa.; soused three times in a pond and warned to leave.

Rev. H. Addison, Md.; banished, estate confiscated, of value of thirty thousand pounds.

Rev. John Agnew, Suffolk, Va.; banished.

Rev. John Andrews, Master Episcopal Academy, Conn.; banished.

Rev. East Aphthorp, Cambridge, Mass.; banished.

Rev. Dr. Anclmuty, Rector Trinity Church, New York; church, rectory, and school burned; loss twenty thousand pounds.

Rev. Ephraim Avery, Rye; cattle killed, banished.

Rev. Luke Babeock, Phillipsburg, N.Y.; cattle killed; robbed, died.

Rev. Jacob Bailey, Dresden, Md.; robbed, starved, banished.

Rev. Thomas Barton, York, Pa.; imprisoned two years, died.

Rev. Daniel Batewell, York, Pa.; imprisoned, died.

Rev. Abraham Beach, John Beach, Conn.; harried, shot at, cattle killed.

Rev. John Beardsley, Conn.; robbed, banished.

Rev. George Bissett, Newport, R.I.; church wrecked, banished.

Rev. Jonathan Beach, Annapolis, Md.; imprisoned two years.

Rev. John Bowie, Md.; imprisoned two years.

Rev. John Brunskill, Va.; driven away.

Rev. John Bullman, Charleston; banished.

Rev. Mather Byles, Cambridge; banished.

Rev. Henry Carver, King's Chapel, Boston; banished.

Rev. William Clark, Dedham; imprisoned, banished.

Rev. Richard Clark, Charleston; banished.

Rev. Samuel Cook, Shrewsbury, N.J.; driven away.

Rev. Thomas Coombe, Philadelphia; imprisoned, banished.

Rev. Mr. Cooper, Charleston; driven away by his parishioners.

Rev. Jacob Duché, Philadelphia; first chaplain of Congress, turned Tory, banished.

Rev. Edward Edmonston, Baltimore; fled.

Rev. John Eversfield, Md.; tried, discharged as "too old to do any hurt."

Rev. Samuel Fayerweather, R.I.; "silenced."

Rev. Nathaniel Fisher, Salem, Mass.; imprisoned, banished.

Rev. John Graves, Providence; "silenced."

Rev. Matthew Graves, New London, Conn.; driven away by his own people.

Rev. Charles Inglis, Rector Trinity Church, New York; warned not to read prayers for the king; persisted in doing so; an infantry company entered church during service, with beat of drum, to overawe him;

- but he read the prayers; compelled to flee; his property confiscated; became first Bishop of Nova Scotia.
- Rev. Thomas Johnson, Charlotte Co., Va.; "with a great bowl of grog in his hands drank success to the British arms;" banished.
- Rev. Jeremiah Leaming, Stratford, Conn.; his portrait nailed to the sign-post, head downward; imprisoned; left to suffer from cold and nakedness; contracted hip disease; lamed for life.
- Rev. William McGilchrist, Salem, Mass.; "silenced."
- Rev. Alexander McCrae, Littleton, Va.; mobbed, whipped, threatened with death; but persisted and stayed.
- Rev. Mr. Micklejohn, N.C.; banished.
- Rev. Richard Moseley, Litchfield, Conn.; banished.
- Rev. Harry Monroe, Albany; banished to Canada.
- Rev. Samuel Peters, Hebron, Conn.; mobbed, stripped, banished.
- Rev. Jonathan Adell, N.J.; arrested, escaped.
- Rev. Joseph Reed, Newbern; ejected by his people.
- Rev. Winwood Sergeant, Cambridge, Mass.; banished.
- Rev. John Scott, Everston, Mass.; arrested, banished.
- Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., Westchester, N.Y.; threatened, shot at, imprisoned, took refuge in British lines; made maps of Long Island for the British army, accepted British chaplaincy.
- Rev. John Stuart, missionary to the Mohawks; arrested, chapel defiled, a bottle of rum emptied over the altar, banished.
- Rev. Epenetus Townsend, North Salem, N.Y.; arrested, banished, drowned at sea.
- Rev. John Troutbeck, King's Chapel, Boston; banished, captured by pirates.
- Rev. Roger Viets, Simsbury, Conn.; fined twenty pounds, imprisoned, banished.
- Rev. William Walters, Trinity Church, Boston; banished, property of seven thousand pounds confiscated.
- Rev. John Weeks, Marblehead, Mass.; banished, died of poverty and exposure.
- Rev. Isaac Wilkins, D.D., Westchester, N.Y.; banished, his writings dressed in tar and buzzard's feathers, and burned.
- Rev. John Wingate, Orange Co., Va.; books burned.
- Rev. Edward Winslow, Quincy, Mass.; banished.
- Rev. John Wiswall, Falmouth, Va.; banished.

PART II.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

PART II.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES.

CHAPTER I.

GATHERING UP THE FRAGMENTS.

WHEN the verdict of the trial by war was reached and the independence of the Colonies recognized by treaty, the English Church in America ceased to exist. As a Church which was content to regard itself as a department of the English state, it could have no being where that state was not. Its fragments lay scattered from Portsmouth to Savannah. The ligature which had fastened these parishes together and tied them to the see of London was now cut, and they fell asunder like so many beads when the string is broken. They had all been wasted by war, and many had perished during the last ten years from sheer neglect. Their members, being generally loyalists, had been proscribed during the conflict, and were now under a political and social ban. They had hoped that England would guarantee their rights in the stipulations of the treaty. They found to their horror that she had abandoned them in the most cold-blooded manner.¹ They had been robbed, outraged, their property confiscated, and their persons roughly handled, and now they not only found that they had no redress, but that they were again confronted with a new peril. During the war the colonists' hands had been full with the foreign enemy. Now that he had withdrawn, they proposed to make a finish of the wretches who had given him aid and comfort. General Greene, Hamilton, Jay, Patrick Henry, Gadsden, and Marion championed their cause in vain.² In spite of their arguments that it would be unjust and impolitic now to proscribe men for opinions which twenty years ago had been held by everybody,³ the passions of the populace ran so high that they set about deliberately to extirpate the hated Tories. They were denounced as monsters who had put themselves beyond the pale of mercy or even justice. Then set in a period of personal violence, social persecution, and legal repression, which is not a pleasant page in American history.⁴ The leading patriots, men who had given their best counsel and their best blood for the American cause, tried in vain to stem the tide. They were themselves swept under by it, and some of them well-nigh ruined. Some of the Tories indeed had no right to hope for anything. The score against them for their deeds in the troubled times was so long and ugly that all who bore the same party name with them were taxed to pay it. Many abandoned everything and fled from the storm.

¹ McMaster: History of the United States, vol. i. p. 109.

² Sabine: Loyalists, vol. i. p. 89.

³ General Greene.

⁴ McMaster: vol. i. pp. 109-130.

They embarked in the British men-of-war and were carried back to England. Numbers moved to Florida and the Spanish possessions.¹ Still more went to Nova Scotia and the Bermudas. In this final emigration the weakened Church was still further depleted. It was left without reputation, without money, without men.

The hostility to it as a Church, however, rapidly subsided. The fear and hatred with which it had been so long regarded as a possible source of political danger, disappeared almost at once upon the achievement of independence.² As a religious sect, it was conceived to be practically defunct. It was regarded as a "piece of heavy baggage which the British had left behind them when they evacuated New York and Boston."³

Now, what shall be done with the thrice broken fragments of the Colonial Church of England? What hands shall gather them up and put them together? Upon what principles shall the new Church to be formed from them be organized?

The first sign of movement among the broken members of the body showed itself in Maryland. There had always been a marked difference in temper, habits, and mode of life, among the Eastern, Middle, and Southern colonies. This difference was even more plainly marked in ecclesiastical things. It became most significant in the reconstruction period now before us. In each section a different motive and purpose dominated the men who set about to rebuild the Church.

Popular opinion of the Church.

Three motives producing reorganization.

¹ McMaster: History of the United States, vol. i. p. 111.

² Beardsley: Life of Seabury, pp. 91, 93.

³ An expression of Bishop Williams, of Connecticut.

In Virginia and Maryland the uppermost thought was to save the endowments of which the Church of England had stood possessed before the war. To rescue and hold these, an organization must be created which could have a standing before the law in the new government.

In New England the dominant purpose was to save the Church's ideal; to guarantee its apostolic order; to establish in its completeness that primitive doctrine and discipline for the sake of which many of its clergy had come out of Presbyterianism at great cost.

In the Middle colonies the leaders set clearly before themselves the task to organize a National Church, an Episcopal foundation which would be to all its members what the federal government then in process of construction would be to its citizens. Of the three ideas Dr. Smith of Maryland, Dr. Seabury of Connecticut, and Dr. White of Pennsylvania, became the several champions. The first failed, partly through the faults of its leader, and still more because the thing aimed at was impracticable: the other two succeeded, and the combination of their plans produced the Church substantially as it has continued to be.

The question which first pressed in Virginia and Maryland was a practical one. Who now should administer upon the Colonial Church's estate? The property was a valuable one. It consisted not only of churches, glebes, parsonages, and landed endowments, but also of the right to the proceeds of taxation for religious objects. Who was its owner? It was contended on the one hand that the property had been created by the state; that the state, while the state was England, had only held the property in trust for the public religious weal; that a new state was now substituted for the old one; that the new one was seized of all the power and right in the premises which the old one had possessed. But it was agreed on all hands that in the new state there should be no religious establishment. What, then, should it do with the Church property which it found on its hands? Should it resume it and secularize it?—retain it as a trust for the benefit of all religious denominations?—turn it over in fee simple to the representatives of the Colonial Episcopal Church? If the latter, who was its representative? The Bishop of London?—that was absurd on the face of it. The various parishes?—they were not independent legal corporations, but only subdivisions of an empire which was now extinct. In any case the question of how to dispose of the proceeds of taxation would still remain.

The Southern attempt.

The Churchmen's feeling was that the property was theirs absolutely; they would not agree that the state had simply held it in trust for them; they insisted that it had been a gift outright. But the practical difficulty could not be evaded. There was no organized Church on the ground which could take it over, even if it were offered. Maryland had indeed, after the Declaration of Independence, "secured to the Church of England all the glebes, churches, chapels, and other property owned by her,"¹ but the question now was, who represents the Church of England?²

¹ Hawks: Ecclesiastical Contributions, vol. Md. p. 288.

² Hawks: Ecclesiastical Contributions, vol. Va. p. 224 et seq.

One of the most sagacious men of his age, the Rev. Dr. William Smith, previously rector of the Philadelphia College, and now President of Washington College, lived in Maryland. He foresaw, while the war was raging, that this question would have to be met, and that upon its right answer would depend the Church's temporal fortunes in that State. In 1780 he called a conference of clergy and laymen to consider the matter. His purpose was to organize the disjecta membra into a body corporate which could have a local habitation and a name. He gave it the name himself.¹ He called it the "Protestant Episcopal Church." This name, which still obtains, does not seem to have been the result of any special thought or deliberation, but was adopted unconsciously as the title which best expressed the fact. They could not have called it "the Church" in any exclusive sense, for their intention was to approach the Legislature which had just declared that it was not the Church in that sense. They could not call it "the American Church," for there was no American Church. To call it "the Catholic Church" would have been in the face of a common usage which had already given that title to another body. But, in common with all the Churchmen of their time, they assumed that they were Protestant;—Episcopacy was their differentiate. They combined the two facts and gave the Church its present name.

The result of the conference was to recommend that the action already taken by the State, allowing each denomination to receive the benefits accruing from taxation, should be accepted; and that, in addition, the Protestant Episcopal parishes should be allowed "to lay rates on pews," or otherwise to increase their revenue.¹

¹ Smith: Life of Dr. William Smith, vol. ii. p. 39.
Cf. Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 5.

This was while the war still dragged its length along, and the Legislature took no action upon their recommendation. When peace had come, Dr. Smith induced Governor Paca, his old pupil at the Philadelphia College, to bring the matter forward in his message. At the same time, in conjunction with another minister, he asked leave to call a formal conference.² This convention, which met at Annapolis, in 1783, contained eighteen clergymen. It called itself the Protestant Episcopal Church in that State. It declared itself to be the legal and actual successor of the Church of England there; that therefore all glebes, lands, and property belonging to its predecessor now belonged to it by law; that it would be at once its right and its duty to modify the liturgy and customs of the old Church so as to fit the changed political circumstances; that in doing so it must not be thought to destroy its identity; that in order to hold its trusts and discharge its duties it must now proceed forthwith to effect a complete organization; that the prime thing needed for the complete equipment of an Episcopal Church was a bishop. The Rev. Dr. William Smith was elected to fill that office, when, and as soon as, he could procure consecration. Dr. Smith's testimonials of

Organization
in Maryland.

¹ Smith: Life, vol. ii. p. 93.

² Ib. vol. ii. p. 93.

fitness for this office were signed by the eighteen clergy present, and afterward by the few others in the State who were detained away.¹

Virginia, in the process of organization, followed much the same lines.² In both States the feeling and action were the outcome of their previous habits of Church life. They approached the task upon the side which first presented itself. That was the secular side. Ecclesiastical issues of great importance were bound up with it, but these were not at first so clearly seen as in both the other groups of colonies. But to them fell the weighty task of settling the relation of the Church to the civil power in the new Republic. Before it was finally determined, the Church was shorn of much of her former prerogatives, and lost much property which was equitably hers. But here, as always, the children bore their parents' faults. To disentangle Church and State in the colonies where they had been united for a century and a half, was a task so arduous that it would have been too much to expect it to have been done without errors, and even injustices. But, upon the whole, it was effected with a fair amount of equity.

Relation of Church and State.

¹ Smith: Life of Dr. Wm. Smith, vol. ii. p. 100.

² Hawks: Contributions, vol. Va. p. 179, et seq.

CHAPTER II.

THE NEW ENGLAND PLAN.

IN New England the controlling motive was ecclesiastical. The Church Idea had been far better wrought out there than elsewhere. Two influences New England Churchmanship. had been at work for fifty years, to elevate the tone of Churchmanship. The "New England converts," led by President Cutler and recruited constantly by men of a like way of thinking, had all come to the Episcopal Church from strenuous conviction. They had studied her history. They knew her claims. They had forfeited much which they held dear when they transferred their allegiance to her. They had been called upon again and again to give a reason for their faith. No slight reason would suffice. Their challengers were men who knew how to weigh proofs and to test assumptions. They lived among a people who dearly loved an argument. To hold their own they must know clearly what they believed, and why they believed it. This had compelled them to work out the theory of the Church, and to free it from all subordinate considerations. Naturally they became pronounced Churchmen.

In this position they were sustained by the disposition of the Society for the Promotion of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, by which society most of them were supported. The "Venerable Society's" position in this regard had been emphatic from its organization. The New England clergy were agents much to its liking. In the other colonies Episcopacy was often regarded as just a part of the existing order of things. It was accepted without much thought either way. It was as good a mode of Church organization as another, in some points better, but, still, not a thing of life and death value. Its history was venerable; its endowments were valuable; its manners were good; its followers were worthy men; it was a present fact; but its ground and essential reason were not much studied. Beside that, the shocks and disturbances of revolution had brought people into the way of thinking all things capable of change. What institution could have been imagined more unchangeable and established by longer prescription than monarchy? But monarchy had been abandoned as an outworn and useless piece of lumber. Why not Episcopacy also?

The Churchmen of New England were very apprehensive of this latter feeling. What else, they asked, would account for the action of the Burlington Convocation, which entertained the proposition of an Independent Episcopal Church? What but this could explain the pestilent plan which Dr. White had just wrought out in his awful pamphlet?¹ Their own convictions had not been disturbed by the Revolution. Their sympathies had not gone with it. They were Tories. They accepted its results as a providential dispensation which they could not gainsay, but they had no part or lot in its spirit of change. They had never had any endowments to seduce them from the pure, spiritual conception of the Church, or to distract them now from their clear purpose of securing the primitive Faith and Apostolic Order for which they had already suffered.

Their distrust of the loose views of other Churchmen.

¹ Beardsley: Seabury, p. 97.

Their strength was mainly in Connecticut. When the war was over, there were in that State forty Episcopal congregations, fourteen clergy, and a Church population of about forty thousand.¹ Unlike the other States, Connecticut had not fallen foul of the Tories when victory settled on the American side.² They were allowed to repair their broken fortunes unmolested, in whatever way offered, but when they learned what their fellows in New York and Massachusetts were suffering they walked in fear and trembling.

Word was quietly passed about among the clergy to attend a meeting to consider the state of affairs. Ten of the fourteen met at Woodbury, a little straggling village among the hills of Litchfield County. Their meeting was kept a profound secret.³ They were very doubtful as to how their plans would be regarded by the populace. Ten years before, an attempt to secure the Episcopate would have raised a howl; there was reason to believe that it would be still more strongly resented now that the Presbyte-

First Connecticut Convention.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 137.

¹ Beardsley: History of Church in Connecticut, vol. i. p. 346.

² Ib., vol. i. p. 353.

³ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 78.

³ Beardsley: History of Church in Connecticut, vol. i. p. 346.

rians were in position to formulate their objections in the shape of law. Nor were the clergy sure of their own laymen. These were not taken into council. The political obstacles. Those of them who were loyalists were in sufficient peril already. It would require all their circumspection to come out of it unscathed. To exacerbate the situation by a revival of the Episcopate seemed very madness. But the clergy were both courageous and clear-minded. They saw distinctly that the life of the Church was at stake. If anything effective were to be done to secure it, it must be done at once. There was serious risk in what they proposed to do. The temper of the new State towards Episcopacy had not been tested, and, judging by the past, the worst might be looked for. They would therefore not involve the laymen in the project at all; they would proceed at their own proper peril. If they succeeded in building the Church, well and good; if not, they would fail like honest men and conscientious Churchmen. There are no records extant of their proceedings at this conference at Woodbury. No minutes were kept, no roll of the members' names has come down. In truth, it was hardly a convention in any sense. Every man present had had his mind made up, long before, what was to be done. There was only one thing to do, that was to secure a bishop. The meeting was only to determine whom they should select to undertake that duty. It was no question of preferment, nor were there many available men to choose from. Whoever he might be must, of course, be a man whose life and learning would be respectable; but they could all meet that requirement. The difficulty was to find a man who could accept it. It would mean for him, in all probability, personal unpopularity among his neighbors at home, a costly and dangerous voyage over the sea for consecration, infinite labor to meet and overcome the prejudices of the authorities in the English Church, and, in all likelihood, permanent expatriation.

SAMUEL SEABURY
First Bishop of Connecticut

Their choice fell finally upon two men, either of whom would be suitable, but neither of whom was present.

Choosing the first bishop. They were the Rev. Drs. Jeremiah Leaming and Samuel Seabury. They were both in New York, but belonged in Connecticut by birth and service. Dr. Leaming was an old man. He had been rector of the church at Norwalk, but had been driven away, with loss of goods and friends. When he was informed of the action of his Connecticut brethren, he at once declined the office. He was too infirm to bear the voyage, and, at his age, he could not face the probability of making for himself a new home outside of the State. Dr. Seabury accepted. He was a Connecticut man by birth, and was now fifty-four years of age, in the vigor of his life. He was the son of one of the "New England converts" from Puritanism, and, like all that stock,

Dr. Seabury's career. a High Churchman. He had studied medicine at Edinburgh, been ordained in England, had served as a missionary in Long Island and New Jersey. At the beginning of the war he was rector of the parish at Westchester, N. Y. He had been a pronounced and active Tory from the beginning. With his friends Inglis and Chandler, he had conducted a literary bureau advocating the British side of the contest. He was generally believed to have written the biting letters of Wilkins, signed by "A Westchester Farmer." He had published some very "Free Thoughts on the Proceedings of the Congress at Philadelphia."¹ He had been seized by the Continental authorities and imprisoned, had escaped and taken refuge in the British lines on Long Island. While there he had used his topographical knowledge of the surrounding country to make maps for the military operations of his protectors; had been mustered into the British regular service as chaplain of an infantry regiment; and was now, after his retirement, receiving English half-pay. His personal character and devotion in his priestly office were well known to those who chose him bishop, and were, in point of fact, beyond all question. Both ecclesiastically and politically he was in every way grateful to them. He represented their spirit and their situation more fairly than any other man who could have been chosen.

At the time they selected him they outlined the plan of procedure he was to follow.² He was to go to England and lay before the bishops his credentials, submitting to them the facts which, in the judgment of the Connecticut people, made the appointment of an American bishop an immediate and imperative necessity. He was to leave no stone unturned to secure from them his consecration. In case he should fail of this, he was to go to Scotland and endeavor to secure consecration at the hands of the Nonjuring Episcopal College there. If he should succeed in either place he was to return to Connecticut, -- if he would be allowed to do so. Upon this point there was much doubt. The status of the loyalists had not yet been determined. The treaty was still pending. Its terms might ensure restitution for their losses and security for the future, or it might do the opposite. That remained to be seen. Then there was no certainty that all the States would take the same action upon this subject. It might prove to be possible for a Tory bishop to live in one section, and be outlawed in another. In view of these contingencies he was, if consecrated, to return to Connecticut if that course should be open; if that should be closed, then to fix his seat in some other State. If all should be barred against him, then he was to make his habitation across the border in Nova Scotia. There he could be reached by candidates for ordination without the burden of crossing the sea, and from there he could look out and superintend the Church's growth in New England, while he and it would wait for better times. The scheme had the indorsement of Sir Guy Carleton, and Dr. Seabury sailed away to England in the returning flag-ship of Admiral Digby¹ to carry it into effect.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 30.

² Ib., p. 104

Upon his arrival he found the prospect of success very The sentiment in England. small indeed. The bishops, however they might sympathize with the colonial Church, were chagrined at the defeat of the British power. Lowth, the great Bishop of London, had flatly refused to lay his hands upon any man who was going back to America to preach,² even though he had been assured that Parliament would not demur at his omitting the oaths.¹ To the current conception of the nature of the Episcopal office, it seemed even more absurd to give it to the petty States than it would have been to give it to the colonies, where it could at least have had the moral support of the English kingdom. The bishops were stolid, impracticable, hopeless. While they treated Seabury with consideration, and a few of them manifested a curious interest in American affairs, they were incapable of appreciating, as the Americans did, the kind of an Episcopate which was desired. They were concerned about the "dignity" of the office. There was no suitable provision for the proper support² of Dr. Seabury, so that he might live in a style which a bishop ought to maintain. The office would fall into contempt.³ Moreover, their hands were tied. The law required that a bishop, at his consecration, must swear allegiance to the Crown. They shook their heads when it was suggested that the king in council might waive that requirement. That seemed sufficient to a few, but to most it appeared that an Act of Parliament only could give exemption. Beside that, they feared that if they should overcome all difficulties and consecrate an American bishop, it would be construed as an unfriendly act by the new States, who bishops' reluctance.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, pp. 95, 96.

² McMaster: History of the United States, vol. i. p. 230.

English

¹ Abbey: English Church and its Bishops, vol. ii. p. 186.

² Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 111.

³ This idea was slow to disappear. After the middle of the present century, when Bishop Wilberforce had fixed, by his example, the modern standard, an old don complained that—"I remember when a bishop never came into Oxford without a coach and six. But what does Sam do? Just mounts his horse, without even a groom behind him, and rides away to a visitation before breakfast!"

had now taken their place in the family of nations. England had had trouble enough with America; why should they provoke her further? Her opinion had always been pronounced against this action, and the bishops could not see that the ground of the opposition had dropped out when the Church became innocuous on its political side.

In addition to all this, they were by no means satisfied that Connecticut would receive Bishop Seabury if he should be consecrated. If this should turn out to be the case, they would have on their hands a churchless bishop, who would be an awkward personage to dispose of. This last difficulty was met by showing the declaration of all the leading members of the Connecticut Legislature, to the effect that there would be no political objection whatever to receiving the new bishop, but that, on the contrary, there were so many Episcopalians in the State that it would be for the public good to give them a head.

After interminable delay, an Act of Parliament was introduced to allow a dispensation from the oaths, in the case of bishops consecrated for foreign countries. The bishops gave a tardy assent, but the preliminary requirements were endless. When a whole year had passed, Dr. Seabury was at the end of his patience and of his money. He was a poor man. He had been living for a year in London at his own expense, and there seemed to be no more prospect than when he had first come. He therefore turned his back upon England and her impotent, State-bound Church, and went to Scotland.

The influence upon the American Church of Seabury's Scotch connection has been so far-reaching that

The Scotch and New England
churches.

it is necessary here to suspend the story long enough to trace its origin. In Scotland there were two Episcopal Churches, neither of which recognized the other.¹ At the Revolution of 1688, when the Stuarts were deported, and William of Orange came to the throne, the Episcopalians and Presbyterians in Scotland were not unequally divided.² William offered the support of the government to the Episcopalians, but they would have nothing to do with him. They declared their unalterable loyalty to the Stuart line. When the bishops to a man, and most of the clergy and people, turned their backs upon his offer, he gave his patronage to the Presbyterians. Presbyterianism was established, and Episcopacy was proscribed.

The "Non-jurors."

The bishops and clergy who refused to take William's oath — and hence were called non-jurors — were deprived and their places filled by Presbyterians. Those of the clergy who did take the oath were protected, but placed under the sharp oversight of the Presbyterian General Assembly. Then succeeded a dreadful century for Scotch Episcopalians. Even though it cannot be denied that they had brought the evils on themselves by their factious attachment to the wretched Stuarts, still, their stubborn fixity of purpose in following their twisted consciences must excite admiration. Their marked feature was their Jacobitism. Attachment to their royal line was with them a religious cult.

¹ Abbey: English Church and Bishops, vol. ii. pp. 176-187.

² Grub: Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 316.

James Stuart was the "anointed of the Lord." After him they turned to poor "Prince Chairlie," and took him to their hearts. When Charles Edward, the debauched "Chevalier," died, in 1788, their last idol was broken, but they continued even then to offer a sentimental devotion before an empty throne. In the risings of 1715 and 1745, the Episcopalians were the head and front. After the last, the English government proceeded deliberately to extirpate them as a brood of inveterate treason-hatchers. After Culloden, the Duke of Cumberland, by the King's command, burned every chapel in his path. Scotch orders were declared null and void.¹ It was made a penal offence for more than five nonjurors to assemble for worship. They were driven into holes and corners. The well-disposed clergy and men in English orders were introduced as far as possible. These latter were regarded by the nonjurors as intruders, and they in turn called the others traitors. The Scotch Episcopalians were detested equally by Scotch Presbyterians and English Churchmen. It was an open question whether the Churches in the two kingdoms were even in communion.² Whether they were or not, they certainly were not in sympathy. The Scotch were all Jacobites and all High Churchmen, and in these respects had few in England like them. Two Liturgies had been in use in Scotland for a century and a half. In Edinburgh and the south the English was adopted; but at Aberdeen and the north the Liturgy in use was substantially the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. In its sacramental teaching it was far more emphatic than the English book. After a long and earnest controversy, this Liturgy, in a revised form, was adopted for general use in Scotland in 1764. By that time the repressive laws had been allowed quietly to become relaxed so that the nonjuring remnant, which had its existence mainly about Aberdeen and the Northern Highlands, could meet without molestation.

¹ This was the ground of the constant complaint made by the Churchmen of Virginia and Maryland, at that date, that the clergy who came over to them were "Scotchmen."

² Grub: Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 370.

It was to the bishops of this obscure and broken body that Dr. Seabury turned when he despaired of English consecration. He found in them men of his own spiritual kin. They welcomed him as a man after their own heart. Bishop John Skinner possessed a sort of private chapel, made by throwing together the upper rooms of his modest house in Aberdeen. In that chapel Dr. Seabury was consecrated bishop, November 14, 1784. His consecrators were Robert Kilgour, Arthur Petrie, and John Skinner. They and their Church had a strange similarity to him and his. Both Churches had, through their political situation, been driven to emphasize strongly the divine side of Episcopacy. They both had their homes in the midst of a hostile Presbyterian community. They had each been trained to recognize a king who was hateful to their fellow-citizens. The people in both cases had learned to live their religious lives apart from the people among whom they dwelt. They were not readily touched by the spirit of their time and place. Their spirit was, at its best, serene, assured, self-contained. But it had, and has, its besetting sins. The Churchmen of the nonjuring, Seabury type have been often found to be impracticable, narrow, prejudiced, governed in their actions by inherited sentiments rather than by present facts. But they brought to the building of the American Church its clearly defined architecture. This principle was guaranteed, as far as was possible to do, by the Concordat agreed to by Seabury and the Scotch Episcopal College.¹ This secured the principle of national autonomy by the pledge that the American Church would hold no fellowship with the intruding Episcopal organization in Scotland. It insured Catholic doctrine by the pledge that Seabury would use his endeavor to have the Scotch Communion Office given place in the American Liturgy, — a pledge which he was able to redeem.

Thus, after the labors of one hundred and seventy-five years, there was, when Bishop Seabury returned, an Episcopal Church in America.

He became rector of the parish at New London. He called a convocation of the Connecticut clergy, displayed his certificates of consecration, received their pledge of canonical obedience, avowed the principles which would control his work, and began the Church's share in the task of making and keeping a new nation Christian.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 150.

CHAPTER III.

THE FEDERAL IDEA.

PHILADELPHIA was the American College of Statesmanship. As the meeting-place of the Continental Congress, and, for the most part, the seat of government, it brought together that remarkable group of men who may truthfully be called the builders of the nation. It was the meeting-place of Franklin, Washington, Jay, Madison, Jefferson, Hamilton, Randolph, and Morris. These men were at once students and teachers. They differed widely among themselves as to the exact appearance which the new nation would present when established, but upon one thing they all agreed, — America was a nation. She had and must have an independent life of her own. Beside that, they saw clearly that the various sections of the country were so intimately bound together that their interests must be in common. The long-drawn debates through which the Federal Constitution was fashioned, and the popular tumults amidst which it got itself adopted, all ended by fixing upon the public mind the firm conviction which the leading Federalists had held from the beginning, that the nation is one, and must be bound together in a common government.

The Rev. William White, rector of Christ Church,

WILLIAM WHITE
First Bishop of Pennsylvania

Philadelphia, had spent his whole life in close acquaintance with these statesmen. He approached the problem of the American Church in the same spirit that they did the American State. None of his contemporaries surpassed and few equalled him in sagacity. When the war ended he was thirty-five years old. He was well born, well bred, and well educated,¹ both in this country and abroad. In England he was a friend of Dr. Johnson; had him for his guest at his inn; chatted with him while he watched him at work on his lexicon; supped with him at Kensington; and wrote him when he came back to Philadelphia.² He was on familiar terms with Goldsmith, visited him, praised his work, and condoled with him that so clever a man should have to harness his genius to a cart to earn his daily bread.³ He was ordained in England; became Assistant, and soon after Rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia; was chosen Chaplain of Congress; and, when the war ended, was next after Franklin, the leading citizen of the State. While Dr. Smith, of Maryland, was engrossed with the small economies of a struggling college, and Dr. Seabury was observing the petty routine of an infantry barracks, Dr. White was unconsciously learning the statecraft which guided the founders of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

He took the first step by calling together a few friends at his own house⁴ to talk over the situation.

¹ White: Memoirs, Introduction of Dr. DaCosta, p. liii

¹ Norton: Life of Bishop White, p. 10.

¹ Wilson: Life of Bishop White.

² Norton: Life of Bishop White, p. 21.

³ Ib., p. 21.

⁴ White: Memoirs, p. 93.

No plan of procedure was proposed, but the men present were found to be of the same mind with him.

In May of 1784, there was a meeting in New Brunswick, N. J., of the managers of the "Society for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of Clergymen." This society had been organized twenty years before, and at the outbreak of the war had held considerable funds. Its board was made up of members from New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, acting conjointly. They had had no meeting for more than seven years. Now they came together to re-organize. When their business was transacted, they fell to discussing the general condition of the Church. Some prominent laymen who chanced to be at the same place were called in to assist. During the discussion they learned, *for the first time*² of the action which Connecticut had taken. So secretly had the New England people carried forward their project that the Churchmen of the Middle colonies were in ignorance of it, though Dr. Seabury, the bishop-elect, had already been in England for nearly a year! In point of fact, the people of the two sections distrusted each other equally. In the East they feared the "latitudinarianism" of the South; in the South they dreaded the "ecclesiasticism" of the East. Can this difference be a permanent affair of latitude?

The result of the informal discussion at Brunswick was to issue a call for a conference of Churchmen from all the States, to be held at New York, in October of the same year. Delegations came to this meeting from Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Connecticut. The Connecticut delegation stated at the outset, however, that they were not at liberty to take any formal part in the deliberations while they were awaiting the result of Dr. Seabury's journey to England. The others present proceeded to formulate some general and fundamental principles of organization to be recommended for adoption by the churches in the several States.¹

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 84.

Fundamental principles. Those principles contemplated: (a) A Federal, Constitutional Church; (b) the several States to be its units; (c) its governing body to include both clergy and laymen; (d) the maintenance of continuity with the Church of England, making such changes in worship and discipline only as the changed political

¹ The leading mind in formulating these principles was Dr. White. As finally adopted by the united Church, they were substantially the same that he submitted to the first little group of clergy at his own house in Philadelphia. The form in which they were submitted to the States for action was as follows:—

First, That there be a General Convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America.

Second, That the Episcopal Church in each State send Deputies to the Convention, consisting of Clergy and Laity.

Third, That associated congregations, in two or more States, may send Deputies jointly.

Fourth, That the said Church shall maintain the doctrines of the Gospel as now held by the Church of England, and shall adhere to the Liturgy of the said Church, as far as shall be consistent with the American Revolution, and the Constitution of the respective States.

Fifth, That in every State where there shall be a Bishop duly consecrated and settled, he shall be considered as a member of the Convention ex officio.

Sixth, That the Clergy and Laity assembled in Convention, shall deliberate in one body, but shall vote separately, and the concurrence of both shall be necessary to give validity to every measure.

Seventh, That no powers be delegated to a general ecclesiastical government, except such as cannot conveniently be exercised by the Clergy and Laity in their respective congregations.

situation might render necessary; (e) to confer no powers upon the general body save such as could not conveniently be exercised by the several local churches. The few clergy in Massachusetts and to the eastward were not present, but held a conference of their own, at which they adopted substantially the same fundamental principles.

The conference had no power to do more than recommend to the churches such principles or actions as seemed to its members desirable. But there was no prince or parliament to summon a council, so this conference ventured to do so. They issued a call summoning the churches in the several States to Constitutional Convention. send delegates to a Constitutional Convention to be held at Philadelphia on St. Michael's Day, September, 1785. New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina responded with representatives. Connecticut declined; Massachusetts sent a letter. When the Convention met, two conflicting plans of procedure were confronted. The ecclesiastical idea of New England and the federal idea of the Middle colonies were now face to face.¹

The former insisted that nothing could be done unless they began the business at the right end. The Two possible policies. first thing necessary is to secure bishops; nothing binding can be enacted by the Church until the Church is present; the Church is not present and cannot be until its chief officers are on the ground; anything which such conventions as this may do will be but as the arrangements which children might make in a household while the father is abroad; when he comes he may set them all aside; the bishop is the source of authority; in his absence there is no authority.¹

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 109.

The other side urged in reply, that if the father has his rights and powers the children also have theirs; in this case the children are quite grown up and capable; their action, within its proper sphere, is legitimate and will be valid. In addition, the practical difficulties in the way of the other scheme were insurmountable. Who could determine what number of clergy or parishes should have the right to choose a bishop? Shall it be the clergy of a State? But by what authority is a political territory made a boundary for the Church's action? What is to hinder any group of half a dozen clergy anywhere to combine and choose a bishop? The outcome would be confusion worse confounded. Half a dozen "bishoprics" might spring up in the same State. And even if they should be confined to a single one for each State, what assurance could be given that they would come into federation? Unless some constitution and law could be agreed upon in advance, only anarchy could be looked for.

Guided by this view, the Convention proceeded to its momentous task without New England. The constitution of the Episcopal Church they then elaborated is a document worthy of profound attention. If the Presbyterians may claim to have produced the spirit and form of the Declaration of Independence,¹ Churchmen may claim with a better right to have laid down the lines of the National Constitution. The truth is that in both cases a striking coincidence is all. The State and Church Constitutions. constitution of the Church in point of time preceded that of the nation. But they were the handiwork of the same men, and the result of the same set of circumstances. Dr. White and Dr. Smith had been fellow-students in statecraft with those mighty men who built and launched the ship of State. Their opportunity to put their principles in form came when they applied them to the Church's constitution.² In its salient features it anticipated that other one which was given to the American people five years later. It contemplated: (a) a national organization; (b) the States to be its component units; (c) its governing body to be composed of two orders, clergy and laity; ³ (d) each State to retain in its own hand a sovereign authority, and to conduct its own affairs. On its political side these were its cardinal features. In addition it provided for things ecclesiastical and doctrinal. There was to be: ⁴ (a) a Triennial Convention; (b) bishops when obtained were to be ex-officio members of the convention; (c) persons were to be admitted to Orders upon subscription generally to the Holy

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 112.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Bishop Seabury, p. 234.

¹ "The Mecklenburg Declaration," Craighead: Scotch and Irish Seeds, p. 327.

² Briggs: American Presbyterianism, p. 349.

³ It was draughted by Dr. White. White: Memoirs, p. 93.

⁴ Bishop Seabury's contention that the bishops should constitute a still third house disarranged the scheme as it lay in Bishop White's mind. The balance was restored again by merging into one house the first two proposed.

⁵ Journal of Convention of 1785.

Scriptures, and a pledge of canonical obedience to the ecclesiastical authorities ; (d) the English Prayer-Book was to be the basis of the Liturgy, but to be modified so as to bring it into agreement with the new political arrangements.

The provision in its fundamental law for the admission of the laity into the Church's governing body as an independent estate deserves particular remark. It proposed an arrangement which had not been in operation for fifteen centuries, — probably for sixteen. It was a return to the practice of the most primitive period. Those who were under the domination of the ecclesiastical ideas which had been current at least since Constantine's time, like Bishop Seabury and his fellow-prelates in England, stumbled at it. It was true that kings and princes had for centuries had a potential voice in causes ecclesiastic, but this had not been in their capacity as laymen, but as "ministers ordained of God." The plan proposed was radically different, and it had no contemporary illustration. The churches then in existence which were organized after the Independent fashion were based upon the theory which they still maintain, — that there is no genuine distinction between priests and laymen. To their view they are both alike, and equally, "kings and priests unto God." In the Presbyterian scheme the elders, who at first glance might be taken for laymen, were not so, but were ordained men. For the scheme proposed by the Church, which has as an organizing principle the doctrine of the Ministry, there was no example extant, and it had no imitators for many a year. It is councils.

Laymen in Church

the key to a proper understanding of the Church's legislation since its adoption. Its radical defect, in the form first proposed, was that it provided no proper place for the intrinsic differences of power and right among the orders of the Ministry. It shut the Episcopate out from its proper place. Bishop Seabury became the champion of his order. Fortunately, in the issue his candid, though determined spirit, together with Dr. White's sagacity and incomparable diplomacy, effected that coalescence of the two views which is the Church's present possession. But before the consummation was reached much was to be done.

The Convention proceeded to the second item of its agenda.

The English Prayer-Book had been in use ever since the planting of the colonies. The somewhat superstitious reverence for it, however, which, half a century later, came to regard it as incapable of being changed, did not then generally prevail. Some changes in it were imperative. It was English, and the Church was American. It must either be made catholic, so as to be of universal fitness, or the political portions of it must be made American also. The Convention approached the revision of it with a light-heartedness somewhat startling to those who are familiar with the arduous labors of later years in the same line. The first purpose entertained was to change only its political portions, but, the task being once entered upon, the opportunity to make other desired alterations seemed too good to be thrown away. A committee of one clergyman and one layman from each State represented was appointed to submit to the Convention a schedule of changes deemed desirable.¹ After three days' work of the committee, they reported the revised book. The Convention spent four days in considering the proposed changes, by which time they had taken action upon all that related to political things. There they rested, and referred the other propositions back to the committee, to be acted upon by them after adjournment. There was a lack of clearness in the instructions, which left the committee in doubt as to whether they were to complete the revision and publish the book, or whether they were to report their work to the next Convention for approval. They acted upon the former opinion, completed their task, and published that edition of the The "Proposed Book." Common Prayer known as the "Proposed Book." The work was done chiefly by Dr. Smith of Maryland and Dr. White of Pennsylvania, having before them the opinions which the other members of the committee had expressed generally before they departed to their far-away homes.

The changes from the English Prayer-Book may be grouped conveniently into five categories. The examples, by no means exhaustive, here set forth under each, will give a conception of the "Proposed Book's" peculiarities.

(1) Political:—Prayers for the king's majesty, for the princes, royal family, and for the High Court of Parliament, were stricken out, and in their stead were placed the prayers for the President and for the Congress.

The observation of the 5th November, the 30th January, the 29th May, and the 25th October was omitted, and instead thereof a service was inserted for the 4th July, "being the Anniversary of Independence."

¹ Convention Journal, 1785.

(2) Changes in the Interest of Taste: — Such as, "didst humble thyself to be born of a virgin," for "didst not abhor the virgin's womb;" omitting the plain-spoken and objectionable statement of the purpose of matrimony from the exhortation in the Marriage Service: omitting the "Commination, or denouncing of God's anger and judgment against sinners;" numerous verbal changes of phrases which were deemed inept or inelegant.

(3) Anti-Sacerdotal Changes: — For example, substituting "A Declaration to be made by the Minister concerning the Forgiveness of Sins," for "The Absolution or Remission of Sins to be pronounced by the Priest;" omitting the sign of the cross in Baptism; omitting the phrase "regenerate" in the post-baptismal exhortation; changing in the Catechism the definition of the effect of Baptism from "made a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven," to "made a member of the Christian Church;" omitting "unbaptized" from the limitations of use in the Burial Service.¹

(4) Changes in the Interest of Liberty: — The selections of Psalms to be used to be left to the discretion of the Minister; and likewise the Scripture Lessons.

(5) Dogmatic Changes: — The Athanasian and the Nicene Creeds were omitted; the "descent into hell" was left out of the Apostles' Creed: the Gloria Patri was omitted after the versicles, after each separate psalm, and generally its use reduced to a minimum; the phrase "damnation" in the Communion Warning was altered into "condemnation;" the words "as our hope is this our brother doth," were dropped from the Burial Service, — and the like.

¹ The animus of the changes under this head is evident from the fact that the book was long afterward reprinted for use by the followers of Bishop Cummins.

Two of the categories deserve special consideration. The Introduction of the Office for the Fourth of July was a source of much uneasiness. The large majority of the clergy and people were Tories. It was asking a good deal to expect them to adopt the frame of thankfulness which the service postulates. It was much as though the Confederate States' Churchmen, after the Civil War, should have been required to return thanks for the surrender at Appomattox. It was introduced against the strenuous opposition of Dr. White and such unquestionable patriots as he.¹ But, as is so likely to be the case, the class of men whom General Grant graphically described as those "who did not get warmed up until the fight was over," prevailed to have it introduced, and the Tory members of the Convention allowed it to pass in silence. In after years it might well have found a place among the Offices, but at the time it could but be a stumbling-block. When adopted, Dr. White, who had striven against it, was almost the only man who used it.² Only in two or three places outside of Philadelphia was it ever heard.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 117.

² Ib., p. 119.

The other list is that of dogmatic changes. A glance at them will show that the revisers either doubted the truth or questioned the form of statement of certain doctrines which were and are generally held to be of prime importance. Foremost among them is the dogma of the Trinity. Their treatment of it leads to the inquiry whether they were at all, and, if so, to what extent, under the influence of the Unitarian movement then beginning to attract attention in America?

As has been pointed out, the Deistical infidelity so rife in England and so prolific of evil in the English life of the eighteenth century, never reached the same extent in this country, but yet it made itself felt. About 1760 the negative Deism began to take on the positive form of what has since been called Unitarianism, under the lead of Lardner and Priestly.¹ In the colonies it retained its negative form, and in that shape spread widely. The scepticism of Hume and Gibbon dominated many educated men. It was especially prevalent in the Middle and Southern colonies.² In Boston and its neighborhood it put on the dogmatic dress of Unitarianism. In that shape it came sharply in contact with the Church. The minister in charge of King's Chapel, Mr. Freeman, a man who had not yet been ordained in any wise, was a pronounced Unitarian. The majority of the congregation agreed with him. They found the English Prayer-Book unsuited to their use, and revised it so as to eliminate the doctrine of the Trinity. King's Chapel still called itself a parish of the Episcopal Church. When Bishop Seabury returned with his office, he was asked to ordain Freeman. He emphatically declined. Bishop Provoost of New York was afterwards solicited to do the same. He neither complied nor refused, but referred the matter to the Convention for advice and consent. The advice was adverse.¹ But the King's Chapel people declared that they were justified in hoping that Bishop Provoost would comply, on account of what they knew to be his own sentiment as well as that of some of his brethren in Pennsylvania and the South.² They said that he had proposed in the Convention at Philadelphia to omit the Invocations to the Son, the Holy Ghost, and the Trinity, from the Litany.³ Such a proposition had been made in the Convention⁴ by another person, and there is reason to believe that it expressed a prevalent feeling, not in favor of Unitarianism, but against the attempt to dogmatize upon the great mysteries of religion.⁵ This seems to be the key to the final action of the Church in both directions. They cast out the Athanasian Creed, not because they disbelieved it, but because they disliked it as an impotent attempt to state what cannot be

¹ Abbey: English Church and Bishops, vol. ii. p. 129.

² Sabine: Loyalists, vol. i. p. 141.

¹ History of Unitarianism: fourth edition, Boston, 1815, p. 13.

² Ib., p. 13.

³ Rev. Dr. DaCosta, in editing the memoirs of Bishop White, flatly denies the truth of this statement, and refers to Wilson's Life of Bishop White for its refutation (p. 325). The correspondence of Bishop White there printed does not seem to furnish the refutation. The categorical assertion of Mr. Belsham appears, in the absence of both evidence and probability to the contrary, to be correct.

⁴ White: Memoirs, p. 116.

⁵ Bishop White says: "I am no friend to these metaphysical distinctions which have perplexed the present subject and discredited Divine truth." Wilson: Life of Bishop White, p. 325.

stated. On the other hand, they would not ordain Mr. Freeman even to retain the King's Chapel congregation, because they equally disliked the dogmatic spirit of Unitarianism. This seeming lack of certitude, want of definiteness in doctrine, this repugnance to nice definitions, was altogether distasteful to the New England Church.¹ For this, in some places, as well as for the very opposite reason in others, the Proposed Book was received by the Church generally with scant favor. The best proof of this was that it would not sell.² Even when Dr. White had packages of them sent North and South, and advertised assiduously, they still stood on the booksellers' shelves. New England would not touch it. New Jersey flatly rejected it. Maryland wanted the Nicene Creed put back, and South Carolina wanted still more left out. Pennsylvania and Virginia proposed still further amendments. The parishes generally kept on using the English Book, to which they were accustomed, the officiating minister making such changes as he found necessary.

Having formulated a Constitution and taken the action which they believed would settle a Liturgy, the Convocation proceeded to consider the Episcopate. In this also, their purpose of a National Church controlled. They had no mind to send one of their number abroad for consecration, as Bishop Seabury had gone, accredited only by a little group of unknown clergymen. Whoever went should

The Episcopate.

¹ Bishop Seabury's Second Charge.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 267.

¹ Perry: Hist., vol. ii. p. 119.

² Beardsley: Seabury, p. 309.

go with a backing and authority which would compel a speedy answer for or against their request. Indeed the leaders among them had determined not to go at all without an assurance in advance that they would gain their object.¹ To secure this they drew up an Address to the Archbishops and Bishops of England. Address to the English Bishops. In it they set forth the situation in which the Episcopal Churches had been left by the result of the War for Independence; acknowledge the benefits they had received from the Mother Church in former days; declare their intention not to approach the English State in any wise; and ask the Bishops purely in their spiritual capacity to consecrate such fit men as the Convention representing the American Episcopal Church may send. They intimate plainly that if any legal obstacles should be in the way of the Bishops acting in the matter, it must be their own concern to have them removed.

With the Address were sent certificates from the Executives of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, to the effect that there was no political obstacle on this side of the ocean, and that the Church, when its organization should have been completed by bishops, would be allowed entire liberty to live unmolested.² The whole was intrusted to John Adams, the American ambassador in England. Though anything but a Churchman himself, he performed the duty required of him with interest and zeal.¹ He laid the Address and accompanying certificates before the Archbishop in such a way as to secure immediate and practical attention.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 139. "They who went had all along made up their minds not to go until the way should be opened by previous negotiation."

² White: Memoirs, p. 22.

Meanwhile the Convention adjourned to wait a reply. When it came it was not very satisfactory. Upon the The Bishops' reply. general question, the Bishops answered, that they were ready and willing to consecrate, but that there were some things which needed to first be cleared up. Queer stories had come to them about this Philadelphia Convention. It was reported that they had thrown overboard all the Church's Creeds, or, at least, had reduced them to a point where they could hardly be seen; that they had torn the Prayer-Book all to shreds; that they had adopted a Constitution which gave laymen an unheard-of power in the Church, even to the extent of making it possible for them to pass judgment on bishops; while to the bishops themselves no real power was given. These matters needed explanation. Until further information should be received they could take no action. If a satisfactory explanation could be given, or if the obnoxious arrangements should be modified, they stood ready to consecrate.

Upon receipt of this reply the Convention was hastily summoned to meet at Wilmington in October, 1786. The meeting was short and effective. They prepared an answer, saying that the Bishops had misapprehended the position given to the laity in the new Constitution; that the Nicene Creed and the Apostles' Creed, unmutated, would be retained; that the English Prayer-Book should remain as the standard until it should be replaced by a National Convention with unquestioned power.

¹ "There is no part of my life on which I look back with more satisfaction than the part I took, bold, daring, and hazardous as it was to me and mine, in the introduction of Episcopacy in America."—JOHN ADAMS, in Letter to Bishop White. Wilson: Life of Bishop White, p. 325.

Then they called the roll of States to know if any had chosen men for bishops. New York responded with the name of Dr. Provoost; Pennsylvania with that of Dr. White; Virginia with Dr. Griffith.

Bishops chosen.

Maryland had chosen the celebrated Dr. Smith three years before. Distinguished above all the clergy of his time, a statesman, a theologian, a man of affairs, a Doctor of Divinity of Dublin and Aberdeen, the leader in the Southern Church, and the oft-chosen President of the Convention, he had grave defects of character, which led the Convention to pass him by in silence.¹ His political career had been open to serious criticism. He had an uncertain temper. He had determined enemies. His personal habits exposed him to criticism, even in a bibulous age.

Dr. Griffith found himself to be too poor to make the journey to England, and the Church in Virginia failed to provide him with the means to pay his expenses.²

Drs. White and Provoost went their way to London, and were consecrated bishops in Lambeth Chapel, February 4, 1787. The next day they turned their faces homeward, and entered New York Harbor Easter Sunday, 1787, while the bells of Trinity were calling the people to church.

¹ Smith: Life of Dr. Smith, vol. ii. pp. 450-466.

² Convention Journal of Va., 1787, May 19.

CHAPTER IV.

THE TWO EPISCOPACIES.

WHEN Dr. Provoost returned to his work in Trinity Church, New York, and Dr. White to Christ Church, Philadelphia, commissioned to do the office and work of bishops, their presence completed the organization of a second Episcopal Church in America. Bishop Seabury had been at work in Connecticut for eighteen months. Rhode Island had placed herself under his ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Massachusetts and New Hampshire had asked for his episcopal oversight.

Thus the New England Church had been built up around the ecclesiastical idea which animated the ten clergymen at Woodbury. The Federal idea had prevailed in the other States, but had stopped in its eastward progress at the Housatonic. Can the two Churches, so diverse in sentiment, traditions, and ideals, ever coalesce? The future of American Episcopacy is involved in the issue.

Union seemed to be impossible. Their principles were antagonistic in essentials, and, what is far more potent in affecting action, their passions were deeply moved. In the East they were Tories; in the South they were Whigs. It was a time when political feeling was running higher than it has ever since done, with the single exception of the period immediately preceding the Civil War.¹ A band of well-known gentlemen of position and standing had just vowed to murder Alexander Hamilton for only demanding common humanity in the treatment of Tories.² The laymen in the South could not forget that Bishop Seabury had been a British partisan, a British chaplain, and that his name was still borne on the rolls of the British army, in which he was yet receiving the pay of a retired officer, — a place which he kept till the day of his death.³ Bishop Provoost entertained against him an implacable hostility, which he took no pains to conceal. He introduced into the convention of 1786 a resolution declaring Seabury's bishopric invalid,⁴ in which he expressed the general sentiment of the New York clergy.

The two Episcopal
Churches.

The New England people, on their part, were distrustful of the whole spirit of the Federal Church. They did not believe its leaders to be sound in the faith; and were sure of their unsoundness in Churchmanship. The place given to laymen in the Church's government by the new constitution seemed to them a subversion of ecclesiastical order and Catholic custom. The proposed Prayer-Book was abhorrent to them. It emptied the Sacraments of all meaning, overturned ancient and venerable use, and trampled upon traditions. In doctrine the antagonism

¹ McMaster: History of the United States, vol. i. p. 128.

² Morse: Life of Hamilton, vol. i. p. 149.

³ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 120.

⁴ Norton: Life of Bishop Provoost, p. 134.

⁴ White: Memoirs, p. 161.

seemed to be still greater. The Convention had ruthlessly thrown out the two chief symbols of the Faith, and mutilated the third. To be sure, they had restored the Nicene Creed, but the motive under which they replaced it was, if possible, worse than the one which had led to its omission. The Convention, in their view, were so unmindful of the awful prescription of the Creed that they were ready to strike it out for a caprice, and to restore it to gain the end they sought in England. What reason was there to believe that such Churchmen would ever become comfortable yokefellows with the sons of the New England converts, and the spiritual brethren of the Nonjurors? A federated Episcopacy was an idle and dangerous dream.

So convinced were the Connecticut clergy of this, and so angered were they by the tone of their neighbors, that they set about to complete their own structure and make it permanently independent. They had one bishop; to be completely equipped, they would need two more. The ancient and wise custom of assuring against hasty consecration by requiring at least three bishops to join in every such act was recognized by both churches. The Connecticut clergy chose Dr. Jarvis to go to Scotland to the Nonjurors, as Dr. Seabury had done.¹ This would provide two. For the third they moved the clergy of Massachusetts to choose Dr. Parker of Boston, who, if chosen, might pursue the same course. In that event a New England hierarchy would be established in affiliation with the Scotch Church. Its high Churchmanship and its soundness in the traditional faith would be guaranteed in advance. Fortunately the scheme failed, and America was spared the pragmatic Church which would thus have risen. Closely related as it would have been with the impracticable Nonjurors, and out of sympathy with the political movement of American life, it would have survived as a standing warning against Episcopacy. But the danger of such an attempt being made was very real. Through Bishops Seabury and White it was averted. Seabury's clear grasp of the nature of the Episcopal office led him to see that the solidarity of the Episcopate in a national Church must be maintained. Other bishops were now present in America, and, let the estrangement from them and theirs be what it might, the fact must be recognized. He was quite alive to the political dislike in which he and his were held. He was still more alive to the laxity of the Federal Convention in doctrine and discipline; but he also saw the imperative need of union. Putting aside all personal considerations, he wrote to the newly made bishops a letter of greeting and God-speed. He offered them his brotherly hand. He assured them of his sympathy in their hope for a united Church; that he would work with them to that end; that he would be glad to meet with them as bishops at any time and place to consult of the matter; and invited them to be present at the Convocation to meet at Stamford in the coming Whitsuntide. Up to this time his difficulty had been that there was no power in the Federal Church with which he could negotiate. Now there was: and to this power he offered his memo-

Plans to perpetuate the division.

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 77.

Striving for unity.

randum. Bishop Provoost could hardly bring himself even to make a courteous reply to the proffer of the Tory ex-chaplain. But Bishop White was quick to seize such an opportunity to further the federation. He replied that union was the prime object in his mind, as it had always been; that if the changes in the Prayer-Book were the obstacle, he himself would be the first man to have them modified; but, he states frankly, if the Connecticut people insist that the constitution be changed so as to lodge all power in the Episcopate, and to dislodge the lay order from practical share in Church government, then negotiation will be hopeless; in that case the most which could be hoped for would be that the Scotch-American and English-American Churches might live side by side as friendly neighbors.¹ This letter seems to mark the lowest point of Bishop White's hopefulness. What with Bishop Provoost's savage Whiggery, the Virginia laymen's partisan feeling, and the quiet reluctance of the Connecticut clergy, the task seemed hopeless.

As the Eastern clergy had sought for Dr. Parker of Boston to fill up the nonjuring triad, so Bishop White now sought for him to complete the English complement. Dr. Griffith was still detained in Virginia by his poverty. Dr. Smith of Maryland, the other bishop-elect, was not improving either in temper or reputation, and, in any case, a quiet determination not to accept him is evident at every point.² So he also sought the Boston rector for the third, partly on account of his high charac-

¹ Bishop White's letter, quoted by Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 80.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 79.

EDWARD BASS
First Bishop of Massachusetts

ter, and partly as a strategic move to detach from Connecticut the State which was likely to be her first ally.

But the astute Parker had a project of his own. He had no notion of going for consecration to either London or Aberdeen; indeed, he did not want the office at all. But he did want the unity of the Church. To effect this he cooked a plan which put all the bishops in a corner. Through his management the few clergy in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, who had no great need or any wish for a bishop, decided to choose Dr. Bass of Newburyport for that office, and to send a formal request to all three Bishops now in the States to unite in his consecration. This, he thought, they could not, with any face, refuse to do. But if they should do it, then mutual recognition and practical unity would be an accomplished fact. Organic unity would come as a result.

While the situation stood thus the time came for the Convention to meet at Philadelphia in July, 1789. The presentation of the request of the Massachusetts people for the consecration of Dr. Bass brought up the whole question of the relation of the Churches. Could Connecticut and the Federal Bishops unite in this act? If not, why not? The issue was now, thanks to Dr. Parker, squarely before the Church, and must be disposed of. Bishop Seabury, though not present, was known to be willing to act. It was not thought that Bishop Provoost, also absent, would stand out against any agreement which might be reached. But the difficulty now was with Bishop White.¹ He would be only too glad, personally, to join in the consecration, but he felt that a tacit promise had been given to the English Bishops that no such action would be taken in this country till the full complement of three in their line should be present. It was true that no such explicit promise had been given, but then the Act of Parliament under which he and Provoost had been consecrated provided for three bishops, and it had only been through the accident of Dr. Griffith's detention that this had not been done. Besides this, and still more weighty, was the fact that the Scotch nonjuring Church, from which Seabury derived his Episcopate, was not recognized by the English Church.¹ Bishop White questioned whether two bishops of that line here ought to venture officially to do what the whole English Church would not do at home.

Convention
of 1789.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 28.

The result of the deliberation was the adoption of a set of resolutions, which, it was believed, would harmonize all conflicting interests. They are a model of Christian temper and sagacity.

The first resolution declares it to be the sense of the Convention that there subsists now in the United States "a complete order of bishops, derived as well under the English as the Scots line of Episcopacy."² This recognized the validity of Dr. Seabury's consecration in the independent judgment of the American Episcopal Church.

The second expands the first, and applies it:—these three Bishops have all the power which belongs to the office in respect of discipline, limited only by such canons as the entire Church may fix.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 163.

¹ Grub: Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, vol. iii. p. 370.

² White: Memoirs, p. 396.

The third declares that these powers should be exercised in the interest of the Church in any State which may need and require their use.

The fourth explicitly requests Bishops Provoost and White to join with Bishop Seabury in the consecration of Dr. Bass.

The fifth takes account of the difficulty in the way, and promises to address the English Bishops to have it removed, in case it should really exist, of which there is reason to doubt.

This settled one of the points of disagreement. Two others still remained. The Constitution already adopted did not give to the Episcopate a separate and independent authority, and did give the laity an integral place in the Church's government. This the Connecticut people opposed. In the second place, the Prayer-Book, as it had been changed, was obnoxious to them. The Convention now reconsidered both these actions so far as to leave them open to be rediscussed and acted upon by the united Church, in case the Connecticut people should come in.

Having done so much and notified Connecticut of its action, it took a recess till the following September, to await the result. When September came, Bishop Seabury came also. The whole Episcopal Church in the United States being now represented, the disputed articles in the Constitution were brought before it. Upon the general principle of admitting the laity to a place in the government, the Convention stood firm. They, however, modified somewhat the application of it, and safeguarded it against the possibilities of evil which Bishop Seabury apprehended.

Adjusting differences.

In the matter of the place of the Episcopate in the government, Bishop Seabury's Toryism was like to have wrecked the whole enterprise. The laymen Bishop Seabury's Toryism. could not get over that British half-pay of his. This hateful fact bulked so before their eyes that they could not see the ecclesiastical question at issue. Fortunately Bishop White, the well-known patriot, was able to take them aside and show them that "ecclesiastical bodies needed not to be over-righteous, or more so than civil bodies, on such a point;"¹ that this was a dead issue; that the half-pay was for services rendered long ago, and did not prevent him now being a good citizen of Connecticut; that he might even be returned to Congress from that State, and, if so, could take his seat with the half-pay in his pocket. The Bishop was able to persuade the Whig gentlemen to keep silence. The Constitution was changed to the extent of constituting the Bishops a separate House, only providing that a four-fifths vote of the other House might override their action. With this, Connecticut was fain to be content.

In the matter of a Liturgy, the Proposed Book found Adopting a Liturgy. no one to say a good word for it. It was resolved that the point of departure should be the English Prayer-Book in common use; that it should be revised so as to bring it into harmony with the political status. These changes were made with care and caution. The Fourth of July service departed into obscurity with the book which contained it.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 168.

An Office for the Visitation of Prisoners, from the Irish Prayer-Book ; the Thanksgiving Day Service from the Proposed Book ; and a Form of Family Prayer were all adopted. The Convention would not accept the Athanasian Creed on any terms, though Bishop Seabury strenuously urged it. But it accepted at his hands the Prayers of Consecration from the Scotch Book.

These things being done, the Connecticut people formally gave in their adhesion ; the two rival Union. Churches ceased to strive ; and there became one Protestant Episcopap Church in the United States.

CHAPTER V.

STRUCTURAL DEVELOPMENT.

THE United States and the Protestant Episcopal Church were organized the same year and largely by the same hands. In both cases a Federal Government took the place previously occupied by a congress of independent States. The constitutional history of the Republic in the century which has succeeded has attracted many pens. A brief sketch of the Church's structural development becomes of interest.

In the experiment then begun, the State had an infinitely easier task than the Church. For a century and a half the States had been accustomed to self-government, to a large degree. Indeed, this was one of the political inheritances of the race. The town-meeting then, or even now, differs little from the folk-gatherings of the Germanic peoples two thousand years ago. In the political life the result of the Revolution did little more than transfer the rule from King and Parliament to President and Congress; it did not seriously change the subordinate machinery of government in the States, counties, and towns. To adjust the new Federal Constitution to the old political life was, therefore, not a difficult task, once men's passions had subsided.

In the Church, on the other hand, the new order of things was revolutionary to an extent hard to conceive. It broke at a single stroke the traditions which had controlled Episcopacy for more than a thousand years. The Church, nowhere more than in England, had been accustomed to associate Episcopacy with Monarchy. Churchmen themselves were under the domination of this idea. For more than two centuries the congé d'élire of the king had been taken as authority in the choice of a bishop. Convocation had been silent for so many years that men had nearly forgotten its existence. Even when it did possess life it was not a popular body, deriving its authority from the people, but an agent whose powers, at the last analysis, were inherent in the State. In the long struggle between King and Parliament the people had gained the right, and ever since exercised the habit, of self-government in secular things; but in the same struggle the Church had stood by the King, and, in consequence, remained bound by the ancient fetters. So long had this continued that Churchmen had not only lost the habit, but also the wish, for independent action. The familiar forms of procedure whereby the people registered their votes, and made known their will in political things, were not the wont of the Church.

From government by bishops, themselves the creatures of the king, to government by a convention made up of popularly selected bishops, priests, and laymen, is a tremendous leap. When the convention is composed of men who had been born and reared and had their habits fixed under another ecclesiastical system, the wonder at its success

The experiment revolutionary.

Government
by convention.

becomes still greater. It took long to disentangle this primitive Church revived from the traditions of the monarchical period. Reactionaries even yet dream of the time when Charles First was king.

The immediate task before the newly federated Church was to adjust the mutual relations of bishops, clergy, and laity. Each order had an independent voice in the management. How could they act harmoniously? The introduction of the laity into the place assigned to them was a momentous step. The ecclesiastical mind of New England was opposed to it entirely. Connecticut only came into the federal association upon the formal assurance that lay representation was but a privilege allowed to any State, which it might waive without suffering any diminution of its own strength in representation.¹ They accepted it as a privilege of doubtful wisdom, but sent lay delegates in 1792. Even after a century has elapsed they still exclude laymen from the Standing Committee. Upon the whole, however, this most revolutionary of the changes introduced became soonest accepted and fixed in a well-defined function.

There was far more confusion as to the rights and powers of bishops. In the colonial days the absence of discipline was constantly deplored. It was absent because no bishop was present. A simulacrum of it appeared in the person of the Bishop

Relation of the three orders.

The powers of bishops.

¹ "The Church in each State shall be entitled to a representation of clergy or laity or both. In case the Church of any State should neglect or decline to appoint these deputies of either order, or if it should be their rule to appoint only out of one order, the Church in such State shall nevertheless be considered to be duly represented . . . by either order." (Letter of Federal Convention to Bishop Seabury.)

of London's Commissary; but what power he possessed was recognized to be but delegated by his principal, in whom it inhered. Now that a bishop was on the ground, what rights and powers are his? How far may they be modified or restrained in action by the co-ordinate powers of clergy and laity in convention? In one form or other, this question has been before the American Church for a century. The general drift has been toward that undue limitation of their inherent powers which Bishop Seabury feared. Their unqualified power of "visitation" was at first conceded.¹ It was not only their right but their duty to make inquisition of the working of every minister in his cure: "to examine the state of his church and inspect the behavior of the clergy." The minister and church-wardens are charged to give their bishop the information he asks.² The Diocesan Convention has long since assumed this power. It is to it that such reports are now made, for information only, and not as a possible ground of discipline. The bishop's power of initiation in the exercise of clerical discipline, the power which by right and immemorial custom has always inhered in his office, has been almost, if not entirely, taken from him and lodged elsewhere.³ The party offending is not now to be summoned by the bishop to give an account, but presented for trial, if any of his brethren volunteer this service, before a court from which the bishop is for the most part excluded.⁴ In the matter

¹ Canon iii. 1789.

² Canon xi. 1789.

³ Gen. Con. Canons, Title II.

⁴ Diocese of Pennsylvania. Canon xvii.

of ordination, the distinguishing function of the Episcopate, the same gradual process of restriction has occurred. The duty to select fit persons, and to pass upon their qualifications for the ministry, has always, by ancient usage, been lodged in the hands of the bishop in his capacity of chief pastor. Before the federation, Bishop Seabury exercised this power without question.¹ It was the same authority which had warranted the English bishops in ordaining him and the hundreds of others who had crossed the sea for that end in colonial times. There the bishop had not been hindered in his right to beget spiritual children. The convention at once set limits to episcopal discretion here. It precluded the bishop from laying hands on any man, unless he had reached a certain age, and had a field of work guaranteed; but this was only putting an old custom into the form of a law. Within these limits it left the bishop free to act. It provided for him an agent in the Standing Committee whose duty it would be to examine for him the candidates' fitness, but recognized his original power by the provision that "every candidate for Holy Orders shall be recommended according to . . . the requisites of the bishop to whom he applies."² But as time went on, the Standing Committee ceased to act as the bishop's agent,³ and came to be regarded as having an independent authority of its own in the premises. Then a still more radical departure from its original

Encroachment by the Standing Committee.

¹ Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 213.

² Canon vi. 1789.

³ It was first called the "Bishops' Council of Advice."

function insensibly took place, and the Standing Committee came to be thought of as representing the clergy and laity! It is usually so regarded now. From being the bishop's creature, it has become the Diocesan Convention's representative. In this capacity a mixed body of clergymen and laymen now divides with the bishop the power of selecting fit persons for the ministry, and leaves him the power to ordain only such persons as it may think worthy.¹

While the power of bishops in their individual capacity has been steadily circumscribed, so that of the House of Bishops has been extended. The first provision was to give them only a seat ex officio among the other clergy. With this Bishop Seabury would in no wise be content. Then they were constituted a separate House with power to originate measures, but without an absolute negative upon the other House. The clergy and laity could pass any measure over their heads by a four-fifths vote, or through the bishops' failure to negative it within a limited period of two days.² Twenty years later both these restrictions upon independent action were removed, and the House of Bishops received the power which has often stood the Church in good stead.³

¹ Gen. Con. Canons, Title I. Canons 1-8.

Among the "Fundamental Rights and Liberties" laid down in the Convention of 1783, as the basis of federation, is the following: "The clergy shall be deemed adequate judges of the ministerial commission and authority, and of the literary, moral, and religious qualifications and abilities of persons to be nominated to the different orders of the ministry; but the approving and receiving such persons to any particular cure, duty, or parish, when so nominated, set apart, consecrated, and ordained, is in the people who are to support them, and to have the benefit of their ministry." White: Memoirs, p. 94.

² Constitution, 1789.

³ Gen. Con. Journal, 1808.

This same tendency toward legal rather than personal authority shows itself also in the provision for the godly discipline of the laity. Virginia objected to the "Proposed Book" because it gave to the priest the power to repel unworthy persons from the Holy Communion. The sense of the united Church was so much the other way, however, that it not only allowed this power to the priests, but extended the latitude within which the book restricted it. The English rubric required the priest in such a cause to report the case to the Ordinary within fourteen days at the farthest. The American only required him to do so as soon as conveniently may be. The English rule required the bishop to institute an inquiry into the facts of every such case as soon as reported to him. The American says he need not do so unless the repelled person asks for such a trial in writing, within a fixed term, after which his case shall go by default. In such a cause the bishop, the priest, and the person repelled were the only parties. The bishop was at liberty "to proceed according to such principles of law and equity" as he might, and his judgment was final. But, as the spirit of government by convention gained sway, the personal authority of both bishop and priest was circumscribed. The Convention provided for a regular process of trial for a repelled communicant, either by its own canons, or by such as the Diocesan Conventions might adopt.¹ Diocesan Conventions drew the restrictions still closer, and, in some cases, set up mixed courts of clergy and laymen for such cases.²

¹ Canon xlii. 1832.

² Penna. Canon xviii.

The whole legal history of the Church, in fact, is but a record of the successive assumptions of power by the General Convention.

From the outset the Liturgy was taken under its control. During the whole colonial period there had been great laxity in the use of the Prayer-Book. Control of the Liturgy. But few people possessed copies of it, and in public worship the "clerk" spoke for all the congregation. Beside that, there had been no power present to enforce uniformity. But the practice of the two hundred years since the English Church had avowed her settled purpose to bring all her members into one uniform mode of worship had produced its effect. The possibility of variety of use in the same National Church had ceased to be thought of. The Convention at once assumed unquestioned control in the matter, and set before itself uniformity as an end. In the early reports upon the "State of the Church," one item always records the extent to which this had been attained in each State.¹ The success was finally absolute. From Maine to California uniformity Tendency to uniformity. was exacted. When that had been achieved there came a reaction which threatened revolution. Ritual violations of law began to show themselves everywhere. They were quite as much rebellions against mechanical routine, as the outcome of strange doctrine. The next phase of the history is that long-drawn effort in which the Convention is now engaged, to stamp out the wide-spread insurrection against its law of ritual uniformity. Its sway in this regard was only achieved by persistent effort through half a century; a second half-century may see it overthrown or abdicated.

¹ General Con. Journal, 1820.

Over Hymns as well as Prayers, the Convention stretched out its hand. It early assumed the power to say what might be sung, and what might not. At a later date it set forth tunes as well, and with the same right. Nor has the assumption been generally questioned. Its power to authorize certain selections from religious poetry has been regarded as carrying with it the power to exclude all others.

It has not hesitated to take cognizance of the personal actions of individual clergymen, and to instruct them to keep away from one another's field of work. It has taken notice of the daily life of the laity, and prescribed rules for their personal conduct.¹

The original Act of Association stipulated: "That no powers be delegated to a general ecclesiastical government, except such as cannot be conveniently exercised by the clergy and laity in their respective congregations." In a century the same "general ecclesiastical government" has gathered into its hands all authority. It would be difficult to say what it might not legally do. In the absence of any supreme ecclesiastical court to interpret the Constitution with authority, any local power to withstand its mandates, any authority to enforce the terms of the original compact, there would seem to be no limit set to the Convention's power except its own will.¹

¹ "All persons within this Church shall celebrate and keep the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, in hearing the Word of God read and taught, in private and public prayer, in other exercises of devotion, and in acts of charity, using all godly and sober conversation." Canon xlii. 1832.

The parties to the original federation were the Churches in the several States. In the early years of State autonomy the history these are uniformly thought and spoken of as possessing independent lives. The old ideal of National Churches was always present to the minds of the founders, but their thought of nationality attached itself to the independent State rather than to the federated Union. In fact, that federation was not yet accomplished, and there was grave reason to doubt if ever it would be. Virginia or Connecticut were far more substantial realities than was the United States. This way of thinking survived until a generation grew up under the flag of the Federal Union. Then it was seen that while State lines might be convenient boundaries for ecclesiastical dioceses, there was no necessary relation between the two things. The quality of nationality could not be claimed for an individual State to the extent which would warrant the inhabitants of it acting as a National Church. This quality had insensibly transferred itself to the Federal Union. When this fact came to be recognized, there was no principle to hinder the division of a State into convenient dioceses, or the grouping of several States into one ecclesiastical district.² But when this was done, and New York had been divided, the accepted principle of representation at once became indefensible. State autonomy had disappeared. The idea of diocesan autonomy had not yet emerged. The States Gradually abandoned. had had an equal representation in convention allowed them from the first. But this was not from any idea of diocesan equality, but from the thought of each being a National Church. That principle being abandoned, an equal representation, regardless of numbers or strength, became at once inequitable. But the method had become entrenched in custom, and acquired the authority of prescription, and so it survived. It became only a question of time, however, as to when the Church should recognize the change in the fact, and bring her practice to conform thereto.

¹ Dr. Francis Wharton, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 400.

² "Address to the Clergy and Laity of the P. E. Church residing in the Western Part of the State of New York," 1835, p. 20.

The same lust of legislation which led the Convention to regulate prayer, praise, and conduct, led it also to enact by law a detailed system of doctrine.

In the sixteenth century the Church of England had been coerced by the doctrinal spirit of the age to set forth a detailed body of divinity in her The Articles, and their origin. Thirty-nine Articles. The action was foreign to her genius. But the Romanists had their Tridentine formularies; the Lutherans their Augsburg Confession; the Calvinists the Westminster Confession, and the Church of England was driven by the Zeitgeist to become "like unto the nations." The adoption of such a detailed system of theology was contrary to her history and traditions. The Confession remained in her body like a foreign substance, irritating, until it became encysted and forgotten. When the American Church was organized it had a chance to rectify the error. A wish widely prevailed to omit the Articles altogether. Their importance was deemed so subsidiary that they were set aside until all else was settled. Then the question came up, Shall this Church formulate a body of doctrine? Shall it exact subscription thereto? In 1799 the question was brought forward concerning the Articles. These had not been bound up with the Prayer-Books which had been used in America for more than a generation. They had been thought of as standing upon the same ground that the Homilies did, and were little, if at all, known by the people.¹ The Convention went into Committee of the Whole upon the subject. When it rose the chairman reported the following, which they had agreed upon: "Resolved, That the articles of our faith and religion as founded on the Holy Scriptures are sufficiently declared in our Creeds and our Liturgy as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer, established for the use of this Church, and that further articles do not appear necessary."

Unfortunately, the House saw fit to vote against the resolution² which it had just agreed to in committee. The Bishops were in favor of adopting the Articles. Two years later, some political modifications having been made, they were adopted as a whole. They were ordered to be bound up with the Prayer-Book in all future editions. No formal subscription to them was prescribed. There they have stood since. What binding force upon belief they may carry, each decides for himself. They are a section of sixteenth-century thought transferred to the nineteenth. They have never exercised any appreciable influence upon the life or belief of this Church. Like all contemporary Confessions, they have largely ceased to be intelligible. They are a water-mark of a previous tide. The current of the Church has flowed on unmindful of them. The last revision of the Prayer-Book provides for their being bound up next its cover; the next will probably bind them outside.

Their binding force.

¹ Letter from a Churchman to His Friend in New Haven, 1808, p. 29.

² Con. Journal, June 14, 1799.

CHAPTER VI.

FROM THE OLD TO THE NEW.

BETWEEN 1790 and the close of the War of 1812, a profound change occurred in America. It was the passage from colonial to modern life. The Revolution had made it necessary and cleared the way for it. The Federal Constitution had fixed the lines of its ultimate development. The Protestant Episcopal Church was equipped to keep step with it. But the mature men of 1790 had been reared in a social, religious, and commercial environment as different from that into which their sons emerged when they took the management of affairs, as could well be imagined. The fathers, both in Church and State, had been wise builders. But they were as little at home in the house which they had erected as is the plain and successful man of business in the splendid mansion which he builds for his children after he has made his fortune. The Revolutionary men were too old to adjust themselves easily to the new Change of manners. régime. That compelled the abandonment of old customs, and prejudices still more close-clinging than custom. Wigs were laid aside. The sword, heretofore the badge of a gentleman, ceased to be carried: Distinctions of social rank were beginning to fade, to the great disturbance of them of the ancien régime.

The formal manners of the colonial period were passing away, and the sharp, business-like intercourse of modern times was coming in.¹ The bishops and statesmen who were to the fore at the beginning of the period were men of the old school. Those whom we shall see at its end were modern men. The change from the old order to the new led through an unhappy and turbulent epoch. In its turmoils the men of clear vision, sagacious mind, and strong hand, who had fought a battle against odds, cemented the State, founded a Nation, and organized a Church, one by one dropped out of sight. It seemed as though the titanic task they had accomplished had drained their energies. One of the most brilliant epochs in the history of the American people is followed closely by one of the darkest. The body politic and the body ecclesiastic seemed exhausted after the strain of the great effort for independence. Disorders of all sorts broke out in the depleted system. Virulent party strife racked it with pains. Federalist and anti-Federalist assailed each other with a rancor unknown in modern politics. No name was so great and no character so high as to bring its owner safety. Washington was called a "fool by nature," and Franklin a "fool by old age." Scurrilous pamphlets, abounding in personalities, pasquinades, and libellous newspaper articles were the least objectionable of the weapons used.¹ When these were not violent enough, clubs and smallswords took their places. Both parties agreed in attacking what they thought the shameful extravagance of Congressmen. States wrangled about the ownership of the public lands, and while they argued, land-jobbers stole them.¹ Debate ran fierce and high about slavery. The smallpox devastated New England, and the yellow-fever threatened to depopulate Philadelphia and New York. A shameful panic seized the people. Ties of nature and of affection were disregarded, and each man thought only of himself. The horrid selfishness of fear demoralized the populace. The Indians broke out against the frontiersmen on the Ohio and the Maumee. Harmer and St. Clair were beaten by their savage enemies, and it looked as though the movement westward would be stayed at the Ohio. Algerine pirates seized upon the ships of the new nation and sold their crews into a hopeless slavery. Speculation ran rife. Even city councils took to gambling. Drunkenness threatened to debauch the nation. In the Western settlements whiskey was the only currency used. A tax on its manufacture raised an insurrection which it required the national resources to suppress. In 1810 there were fourteen thousand distilleries in the country, producing two and a half gallons of raw spirits annually for every person in the population, a rate never since reached.² The subsiding animosity against England and all things English was fanned into a new flame by the terms of the British Treaty and the hateful Tory claims.³ "M'Fingal," a satire upon the Tories, after the manner epoch.

¹ Johnson: History of the U.S., p. 167.

¹ M'Master: History of the U.S., vol. i. ch. 5.

A dark

¹ Hawks: Ecclesiastical Contributions, vol. Va., Appendix, p. 81.

² Schouler: History of the U.S., vol. ii.

³ Ib., vol. i. pp. 456, 459.

of "Hudibras," was in every hand and upon every tongue.¹

It was the period dominated by French infidelity. The service rendered the Americans by Lafayette and his compatriots during the war had won the people's heart. France seemed to promise a sister republic. Previous to the reaction caused by the atrocities of the French Revolution, French manners were all the rage. Talleyrand, the apostate Bishop of Autun, De Noailles, Rochefoucauld, Louis Philippe himself, were honored guests. The tri-colored cockade was the favorite decoration. The shallow atheism which led the French to abolish God by decree was widespread here. Jefferson was its scarcely disguised apostle. Tom Paine became its champion. His "Age of Reason," published in 1794, had a circulation and an influence hardly equalled by any single book since.² Its succinet, portable, and specious, even if shallow, arguments commended it to the thousands who were already under the influence of the same spirit from which it emanated, and were delighted to find arguments placed in their mouths. Especially in the South and West did this prevail. The days of Christianity were thought to be numbered, and a reign of "Reason" was at hand. Like the Ingersollism of a later date, it was welcomed by the half educated, who wished the freedom from moral restraints which it

¹ Trumbull: "M'Fingal," now only remembered by its surviving couplet, —

"No rogue e'er felt the halter draw,
With good opinion of the law."

² Hildreth: History of the U.S., vol. ii. p. 464.

carried with it. When Jefferson was chosen President, it seemed to have triumphed utterly. Presidents have been elected since who have sat loosely to the Christian faith, but not before or since Jefferson who have been voted for on that ground.¹

It was a period prolific of sects. Specially in the West and South a brood of them was born. The sober Presbyterianism which the Scotch-Irish had lately carried into Tennessee and Kentucky was overwhelmed by the wave of revivalism which reached its height in this period.² Upon its ruins arose a growth of extravagant churches, so called, destined afterward to fill the valley of the Ohio.

What could the newly organized Church do in such an age? The devastation of war, the fury of political Position of strife, the revived animosity to England and the Church. all things English, the craze of French infidelity, the unsettling of fixed habits, the loosening of creeds, the weakening of reverence, all wrought against her growth.

By the happy union of the New England and the Federal ideas in the ecclesiastical constitution, signed by all the States in 1789, the Church had escaped the peril of permanent schism, not to say of anarchy. Upon the death of poor Dr. Griffith, Virginia chose Dr. Madison, who went to England for consecration, and thus completed the English line. Both lines combined in consecrating Dr. Claggett Bishop of Mary-

¹ Centennial Council, Va., p. 139.

¹ Chase: Reminiscences, vol. i. p. 108.

² Roosevelt: Winning of the West, vol. i. p. 133.

² Hildreth: History of the U.S., vol. ii. p. 463.

land. South Carolina, which had only entered the Federal Church on the condition that no bishop should be sent to her, came to a better mind three years later, and elected Dr. Robert Smith. Massachusetts, the Eastern Diocese, and New Jersey followed. To complete the organization was thenceforth an easy task. The real problem was how to set the enginery of the Church into efficient motion. For a brief period it seemed as though success would be immediate. Multitudes flocked to Confirmation. Bishop Seabury confirmed two hundred and fifty at one time¹ at Stratford, and nearly twice as many at Waterbury. At Bishop Provoost's first Confirmation at Trinity Church, over three hundred presented themselves. They included children of fourteen, and tottering old men and women, who went from the chancel to their pews muttering their Nunc Dimittis. Two venerable ladies were led up by their colored slaves, who stood humbly by until the rite was over.² Bishop Madison, at his first and only visitation to the tide-water section of his State, confirmed six hundred in five parishes.³ But when the novelty of the rite, now for the first time made possible, had worn away, it became very generally neglected. Bishop White does not seem to have deemed Confirmation more essential for the people than he had deemed it for himself. He had never been confirmed at all. He rarely made visitations outside of Philadelphia and the towns close by.⁴

¹ Beardsley: History of the Church in Connecticut, vol. i. p. 430.

² Norton: Life of Bishop Provoost, p. 132.

³ Centennial Council, Va., p. 140.

⁴ Rev. Dr. J. H. Hopkins, in The Churchman, April 22, 1884.

He never crossed the mountains but once. The many Church people who had made their homes in Western Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Eastern Kentucky were entirely neglected.¹ A convocation of clergy assembled in 1801 at Washington, Pa., coming from these districts, wrote to Bishop White, asking that something might be done to organize the Church in the West, but, after waiting eighteen months for an answer, were told that nothing could be done. Bishop White does not give any account at all of his Episcopal work until 1809. During the twenty years which succeed, his visitations averaged only six parishes per annum. In the twelve parishes beyond the Alleghanies, Confirmation was never seen but once in his long Episcopate. Indeed he protests in set terms against "the supposition in the minds of many, that a bishop should always be engaged in visitations."² He declares that it is contrary to the usage of diocesan bishops in all ages; that a bishop's time is "as much due to his own family as are any of his services to the Church;" that it is inconsistent with a learned Episcopacy; that it would be oppressive upon an aged and infirm bishop. The bishops were all rectors of parishes,³ and regarded the work of their Episcopal office but little, except in the single function of ordination. Bishop Madison, after his first visitation, paid no further attention to his diocese, but occupied himself entirely

¹ Rev. Dr. J. H. Hopkins, in The Churchman, April 22, 1884.

² White: Memoirs, p. 467.

³ Virginia, from fear that the bishop might come to be considered different from the other clergy, passed a canon compelling him to be rector of a parish.

³ Hawks: Contributions, vol. Va., p. 214.

with his duties as President of William and Mary College.¹ The first Bishop of South Carolina never confirmed at all.² After his death, no successor was chosen for eleven years. Bishop Provoost resigned in 1801, and busied himself with making a new translation of Tasso, and the study of botany.³ During this time he entirely neglected the services of the Church and the Holy Communion.⁴ The convention of his diocese met irregularly. During three successive years it did not meet at all.⁵ The coadjutor, Bishop Moore, proceeded in the same easy fashion, commending the Church, however, as Provoost did not, by his own gentle piety. In 1811 he was stricken with paralysis. Dr. Hobart was thereupon chosen the third Bishop of New York, all three of whom were living at the same time. The situation caused great searchings of heart. The interest, however, did not revolve about the problem of the Church's progress, but of her internal arrangement. We first catch a glimpse here of the party spirit destined later to convulse the Church, and see an exhibition of that pettiness which has always been her besetting sin. The "Low Churchmen" were bitterly opposed to Dr. Hobart's election. Bishop Provoost, to the general amazement, laid down his lexicons, closed his herbariums, and came out to head the opposition. He declared that his resignation ten years earlier had not been irrevocable. He proposed now to assume the

Troubles in New York.

¹ Norton: Life of Bishop Provoost, p. 174.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 189, note.

³ Sprague: Annals, vol. v. p. 244.

⁴ Perry: History, vol. i. p. 190.

⁵ Norton: Life of Bishop Provoost, p. 168.

administration himself, and would not require the services of the bishop-elect. His contention was so preposterous that the House of Bishops would not hear of it, and even his own convention would not allow it. Dr. Hobart must be consecrated. But when the day fixed for the ceremony arrived, the deplorable weakness of the Church appeared. There were six bishops in the United States. Three were necessary to consecrate another. Bishop Provoost was broken in health, and his naturally infirm temper was weakened by the transaction of which this ceremony formed the conclusion. It was very doubtful if he either could or would be present. Bishop Madison of Virginia was so indifferent to the whole affair that he did not think of leaving his college duties for such a purpose. Bishop Claggett of Maryland was taken ill on his way North, and obliged to turn back. Only Bishops White of Pennsylvania and Jarvis of Connecticut were available. It looked as though another journey must be made to England for consecration. That would indeed have been easier than to secure the attendance of three American bishops at one time and place. Finally Bishop Provoost consented to join in the consecration if his health would allow him to go to the church. The other bishops then agreed that if he should be unable, the service might be held in his bed-chamber. Fortunately he found the strength and the will to attend at Trinity Church. But upon his arrival a great difficulty arose. He had adorned his head with a wig, and the other bishops wore only their hair. It was solemnly discussed whether or not so important a function could be of wigs.

The question

performed wigless.¹ Dr. Duché offered to lend Bishop White his for the occasion. But Bishop Jarvis, in that case, would be singular. Bishop White adduced the high example of Archbishop Tillotson, whose portrait shows him wigless. This illustrious precedent was deemed satisfactory for the two, while Bishop Provoost should uphold ancient usage in his Episcopal headdress. The question being settled, the services proceeded, and the three surviving men of the old order laid their hands upon Bishop Hobart, the first of modern Churchmen

Throughout the South and the frontier the condition of things was no better. Between Virginia and South Carolina lay a broad belt of settlements where parishes had once been, and where many Church families were scattered yet. Among the population which was pouring over the Cumberland Mountains into Kentucky and Tennessee there were hundreds of Episcopalians from Maryland and Virginia. These were all as sheep without a shepherd, and were, for the most part, lost finally to the Church.² In the two old States where the Church had been established, destruction was abroad. The loss of the State support, upon which they had become accustomed to lean, left them broken in fortune and in spirit. In Maryland, party strife added the last touch to the dark picture. When Bishop Claggett grew infirm, and Dr. Kemp was chosen for his assistant, a secession took place, under the lead of Rev. Daniel Dashiell, of Balti-

State of things in the South.

¹ Norton: Life of Bishop Provoost, p. 176.

² Id.: Life of Bishop Claggett, p. 110.

more, and an "Evangelical Episcopal Church" set up.¹ The abortive schism never effected more than to harass the already wearied Church. The dawn of a better day was even then visible.

But it was in old Virginia where the gloom was deepest. The Church had been in control there for two centuries, until within a generation. But Low estate in Virginia. that generation had turned away from her in indifference or in anger. During the war, her laymen, the Washingtons, Henrys, Lees, Pendletons, had taken the patriotic side, while the clergy had clung to England and to their glebes. When the new order of things came in, the Church's power was foredoomed. In the judgment of the people it had been misused, and they meant to take it away entirely. The laymen stood by impassive, or joined in the spoliation. In 1802 the blow fell, and the Church's property was swept away at a stroke. Glebes and churches were sold for a song.² The proceeds, which, it had been enacted by the Legislature, should be "used for any public purpose not religious," were embezzled by the sheriff's officers. Guzzling planters topped from stolen chalices and passed the cheese about in patens. A marble font became a horse-trough. Communion plate, the gift of the good Queen Anne, adorned the sideboards of officers of State and country gentlemen. The clergy in large numbers laid down their spiritual callings. At the outbreak of the war they had numbered ninety. At its close, only twenty-eight could be counted. After the spoliation they lost all heart. No convention was held from 1806 to 1812. Then only thirteen could be assembled. When they adjourned it was with no expectation of ever meeting again.¹ "They fear," said the House of Deputies to the Bishop, "the Church in Virginia is so depressed that there is danger of her utter ruin." The people had already gone from her. The Rev. Devereux Jarratt declares that before the Revolution he had often nine hundred or a thousand communicants; now, since the Methodists have done their work, he can scarcely find forty hearers.

¹ Hawks: Contributions, vol. Md., p. 422.

² Ib., vol. Va., p. 224 et seq.

² Centennial Council, Virginia, p. 70.

When William Meade was ordained deacon at Williamsburg, in 1811, two ladies and fifteen gentlemen, most of them his relatives, formed the congregation. The citizens were filling their ice-houses, and the students, with their dogs and guns, had gone hunting. The church was dilapidated and the windows broken. There were grave suspicions that the Bishop himself had renounced the Christian faith.² The literary society of the college had lately discussed: First, Whether there be a God? Secondly, Whether the Christian religion had been injurious or beneficial to mankind? Infidelity was then rife in the State, and the College of William and Mary was regarded as the hotbed of French politics and religion. "I can truly say," says Bishop Meade, "that then, and for some years after, in every educated young man whom I met, I expected to find a sceptic, if not an unbeliever." No minister had been ordained for years save one unworthy fellow, and it was a passing wonder to the people that a young man of good family, an educated man, a graduate of Princeton, should enter the ministry of the Episcopal Church! ¹

¹ Centennial Council, Virginia, p. 143.

² Meade: Old Churches, vol. i. pp. 29-30.

In Connecticut, indeed throughout New England, the Church maintained its own, but made scant progress.

The Church in New England. Bishop Seabury took his office seriously. He was strong in the thing, but lacked grace in the manner. "I, Samuel, by Divine permission Bishop of Connecticut, . . . issue this injunction, hereby authorizing and requiring you, and every one of you, the Presbyters and Deacons of the Church above mentioned, to make the following alterations in the Liturgy and Offices of the Church." ² This was his style toward those who recognized his authority. In an "Address to Ministers and Congregations of the Presbyterian and Independent persuasions in the United States of America," he charges them to return to the fold. This could only be done by "relinquishing those errors which they, through prejudice, had imbibed." This sort of treacle catches few flies.

Bishop Seabury's manner.

On the other hand, his clear and emphatic presentation of the position of the Church had its effect upon a people who have always been moved by argument rather than by feeling. But even in New England a new hostility had arisen. The old charge of lack of spiritual earnestness had been revived. ³ A concerted attempt, in which the Puritan clergy joined, to damage her prospects and reputation, had been systematically undertaken.¹

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 143.

² Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 386.

³ Character and Principles of the Protestant Episcopal Church Vindicated: New Haven, 1816.

It seems unfortunate that it should have fallen to the bishops of this period to meet and pass upon one of the Dr. Coke's most momentous questions which have ever proposition. been brought before that house. This was a proposition from Dr. Coke, the first of the Methodist superintendents. He had been set apart by Wesley in 1784, and had himself commissioned Mr. Asbury in America to complete the organization of that numerous body, then members of the Episcopal Church. After some years of work and experience, Coke, still a clergyman of the Church, wrote to the new-made Bishops Seabury and White, offering a plan of reunion. He proposed that he and Mr. Asbury should be consecrated "as bishops of the Methodist Society in the United States (or by any other title, if that be not proper), on the supposition of the union of the two churches, under proper mutual stipulation." Bishop Seabury never answered his letter at all.² Bishop White replied in his usual courteous style. Bishop Madison of Virginia, who knew better than any of the others who and what the Methodists were, and what their needs were, was anxious that the matter should be accomplished, but the other bishops were untouched. Bishop Seabury did not want it, and Bishop White did not believe it possible.³ They dismissed the project with a general declaration that the Church was always desirous of unity, was ready to alter or modify anything save essentials to this end, and recommended to the several States to propose such conferences with Christians of other denominations as they might think most prudent.

¹ Letter from a Churchman to his Friend in New Haven, 1808.

² Beardsley: Life of Seabury, p. 401.

³ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 126.

At first sight it would seem as though the Church had lost the opportunity of the century through the incapacity of the old bishops to comprehend the new condition of things. Could they have foreseen the mighty ecclesiastical empire to which American Methodism was destined to grow, they would doubtless have laid aside all else, and striven to avert its final separation from its mother. The severance has been fruitful of evil to both mother and child. But it is doubtful if they could have succeeded. It was even then too late. Had the Bishop of London hearkened to Wesley's earnest prayer a dozen years before, and ordained men to look after the thousands of Methodists who were then members of the Bishop's own flock, the division would probably have been averted. But he had refused, and the mischief was done. Wesley's action in sending out superintendents had been well and wisely done. It was the action of a High Churchman¹ and an earnest man. There was no bishop here then, and, so far as men could see, no likelihood of any. Meanwhile "the hungry sheep looked up and were not fed." That the superintendents should take upon themselves the office of bishop, whether they assumed its title or not, was inevitable. No chagrin of Wesley could change the course of events. He had, gone beyond

Methodists
recall.

¹ Stevens: History of Methodism, Appendix.

with an honest purpose, built an engine which he could not control ; but the first American bishops were not the men to either control or direct it. Their great work was done. It had been to organize American Episcopacy. That they had done well and wisely. To bring it into right relation with the other component parts of American Christianity was to be the duty of their descendants a century later.

As the chaotic period now before us draws to its end, signs of new vigor in the Church begin to appear. A Dawning of a better day. generation of men born and reared under the new order are now coming upon the stage. The field is being prepared by a hundred unthought-of agencies. The unpopular war with England in 1812 has ended, and a better understanding exists than did when it began. Churchmen had fought on the American side, and had won their comrades' good-will. Napoleon's duplicity has disgusted the people with the French influence. The Cumberland Road has been built from the Potomac to the Ohio and beyond. Canals have been opened up to carry emigrants and goods. The vast region east of the Mississippi has been purchased. Wayne has broken and scattered the Indians. Settlers' cabins have begun to dot the prairies. Lewis and Clark have toiled up the Missouri, and paddled down the Columbia. Fulton's new steamboat has carried wondering passengers up the Hudson, and its sister craft has been built on the Ohio. Manufactories have crossed the Alleghanies. The cotton gin has started new life in the South. A highway has been cast up. The old life has gone. The modern America has come.

PHILANDER CHASE
First Bishop of Ohio, and afterward of Illinois

With it have come new men. Bishop Hobart is impressing the true spirit of the American Church upon New York and Connecticut. Meade is gathering up the scattered and broken forces in Virginia. Empie and Judd are laying foundations in North Carolina. The sagacious Parker is adjusting the Church to the new life in Massachusetts. The outlying provinces to the northward have been gathered into the Eastern Diocese, and Bishop Griswold is doing apostolic work there. That adventurous missionary and builder, Philander Chase, has organized a congregation at New Orleans, and has come home to prepare for his strange career in the Ohio valley. An Episcopal Academy has been founded in Philadelphia, and another in Connecticut. The Virginia Churchmen are moving to establish a theological seminary.¹ The "Advancement Society" is beginning its work among the frontiersmen. A similar society in New York is sustaining a mission among the Oneidas and Mohawks. Bishop Hobart confirms eighty-nine Indians at one visitation, and ninety-seven at another.² His scheme for a theological seminary at New York is about to be realized through the generous gift of a layman, Jacob Sherred. Tract societies, Bible societies, Prayer-Book societies, have been founded, and a Church newspaper is started.³ Dr. Hobart puts forth his "Companion for the Altar," and defends Church order in the Albany Centinel against the Dutch Reformed Dr. Linn

New men at work.

Representative men.

¹ Centennial Council, Va., p. 79.

² Norton: Life of Bishop Hobart, pp. 56, 83.

³ Ib., p. 43.

and the Presbyterian Samuel Miller. In his "Apology for Apostolic Order" he gained an honorable place for the theory of Episcopacy in the controversial world. Churchmen were coming to the front in American literature, as they had a generation before in statesmanship, and as they were even now in law. Chief Justice Marshall and Chancellor Kent stood foremost in their profession. Gulian C. Verplanck, Irving, Cooper, and Richard Henry Dana brought a new and broader life to American letters.

The Bishops of the new régime make diligent and regular visitations. In some States an Episcopal Fund has been begun, and the Bishop is, in part at least, set free from the engrossing cares of a parish. The multifarious machineries for parochial work are not yet thought of. The Sunday-school is seen in the process of its evolution. As yet it is upon trial, and is more a secular than a religious device. In an Anniversary Address in 1817,¹ Bishop Hobart offers a lengthy defence of the plan to teach a modicum of Church doctrine, as distinguished from the "non-sectarian" instruction then in use. The report of the society before which he speaks shows that up to that time there had been published for the Sunday-schools in the city 8,000 alphabet cards; 2,000 spelling-books; 740 primers; 167 Prayer-books; that several women over sixty had learned to spell quite well; that twelve classes of colored children had learned to read in words of one syllable; that, in the February before, Grace Church had started a school in

Beginning of Sunday-schools.

¹ Anniversary of the New York Sunday-school Society, 1818.

which fourteen gentlemen had come forward as teachers, and they had opened with twenty scholars; that the society hopes soon to issue 2,000 Scripture Lessons, being Bishop Gastrell's "Christian Institutes, a Complete System of the Doctrines and Precepts of the Gospel, in a Connected Series of Scripture Texts;" that they have collected eight hundred dollars, of which two hundred dollars has been paid as salaries to superintendents, and for desks, while the balance is on hand; that they venture to think the success for the year a convincing argument in favor of the new institution.¹

The General Convention Journal for 1820 gives a comprehensive view of the state of the Church. It reports that in Maine, "where for many years it was depressed and almost extinct," it "has now assumed a flourishing aspect;" that in New Hampshire there are nine churches; in Massachusetts it is flourishing, the Canons and Rubrics are generally observed, a large and elegant new church is nearly completed in Boston, and "a few small congregations have been collected in other towns;" in Vermont three new churches have been built, some new congregations have been gathered, and a suit has been entered to secure the demesnes; the Church in Rhode Island is flourishing, and "there is a decided and increasing attachment to the peculiarities of our Communion;" "in Connecticut no material change has taken place;" in New York the growth has been phenomenal, — twenty-four priests ordained and fourteen deacons, and thirty-six clergy have undertaken work in

State of the Church in 1820.

¹ New York Sunday-school Society, Report for 1818.

the State within the last three years; in New Jersey the "Church continues slowly to improve," eight Confirmations have been held in the last three years; in Pennsylvania it "is increasing as rapidly as, when all circumstances are considered, we have any reason to expect;" in Delaware "the state of affairs is certainly improving;" in Maryland is every sign of a new life, and it is recorded as noteworthy that the Bishop has visited nearly every church within the last three years; in Virginia the improvement has been greater still, there are now fifty clergy, and "the conduct of the communicants is more consistent;" in North Carolina the communicants have grown from fifty to more than three hundred; in South Carolina there are signs of a new life; from the remote region of Ohio little information has come, but several congregations are known to have been gathered, one at Dayton and one at Miami, at the least.¹

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1820.

CHAPTER VII.

WAITING FOR VOLUNTEERS.

“THE Report of the Committee on the State of the Church” for 1820 shows that it was then organized in all the original States. There were not yet bishops in all, but the scattered congregations in each had drawn together. In one instance, several separate States had confederated into a temporary diocese, with the expectation that some time the federation would be loosed by mutual action, and each independent unit of it would set up for itself. The idea of propagandism was but faintly, if at all, present in the mind of the Church. The State idea still controlled.¹ The functions of the national body were conceived to be discharged when it had provided and set forth the terms and conditions upon which any new State might come in. When any should be ready it would volunteer to come. Each was thought of as an independent ecclesiastical empire. That had been the underlying principle of the original federation. The idea of the central organism going forth to plant new soil, cultivate the tender shoots, and gather the harvest into the common garner, had hardly begun to be entertained. It was true that the Church’s conscience had been dumbly uneasy in presence of the situation for a long time, but

The National Church inactive.

¹ White: Memoirs, pp. 464-467.

no way to correct it was evident. For more than a generation there had been Church families "over the mountains," ministered to fitfully by itinerant priests, and often crying out for succor. But with the theory which the Church had accepted about her own relation to the States, she was impotent.¹ She must wait until the feeble folk in any political division should grow strong enough, draw together of their own motion, organize themselves into a State Church, choose a bishop, and ask for admission. Meanwhile they must be left to themselves, not unpitied, but unaided. The Rev. Joseph Doddridge, who itinerated in Western Pennsylvania and Virginia in 1811, says² that large portions of that great region, including Kentucky and Eastern Ohio, had Pioneer Churchmen. been settled originally by Church people from Maryland, Carolina, and Virginia. When they crossed the mountains they left their Church behind them. In their old homes they had enjoyed its privileges, as they had those of sun and soil, without much thought or appreciation. But now that it was lacking, they missed it sadly. They could not fall in with the crude religionism which prevailed in the backwoods. Their children were either becoming indifferent, or being carried away by the rude excitements of Methodism. The indefatigable "circuit-rider," with Wesley's tracts stuffing his saddle-bags, was riding from week's end to week's end under the shadow of the ancient forests, stopping at every clearing to leave a tract and a word of exhortation; frequenting the "log-rollings," "house-raising," "huskings," and "scutehing-frolics," seeking a chance to preach; unmindful of heat or cold, swollen rivers or gloomy swamps, of ribald jests or coarse opposition, sustained by the fire of a glowing enthusiasm to "save souls from Hell-fire."¹ The Presbyterians were building their log-churches and cabin schoolhouses, organizing Presbyteries, and fixing the religious life of the region for three generations to come.² The Churchman was left to one side, unheeded. The Methodist pronounced him destitute of "vital piety;" the Presbyterian called him a superstitious moralist; his own National Church left him to live or die as might be. The half-dozen clergy wandering through this widespread region of poverty and religious confusion met together and begged the Church to come and look after her children. But they begged in vain. Doddridge declares that he had no expectation of even being buried as a Churchman when he should die. He affirms, in a letter to Bishop Hobart in 1816, that if the Church had used her opportunity, there might then have been "four or five bishops in this country, surrounded by a numerous and respectable body of clergy, instead of having our very name connected with a fallen Church."³

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 240.

² Ib., p. 238.

These facts had been before the Church, and had disturbed its conscience and heart as early as 1792. Then

¹ Eggleston: The Circuit Rider.

¹ The Hoosier Schoolmaster.

² Smith: Old Redstone.

² Ib.: History of Western Pennsylvania.

³ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 26.

the Convention had passed a resolution urging each parish to take an annual collection for the help of the Church people in the western country, and had appointed the Bishop and Standing Committee of Pennsylvania a committee to administer the fund, and to send missionaries when and where they might see fit.¹ So little came of it, and so little was expected to come of it, that Bishop White, in his résumé of the Convention's acts, does not so much as allude to it.² Sixteen years later a committee of three bishops, three clergy, and three laymen was appointed to consider the situation, and granted the power to send a bishop into the new States and Territories, if they should think it advisable.³ In 1811 the committee report that they had not been able to see their way to take any action. Bishop White suggests, in that connection, that if a bishop should be appointed in that region, he would hope to be relieved by him of the care of his own parishes which lay beyond the Alleghanies!

It would not be fair to say that this long neglect of the regions beyond the pale was wholly the result of indifference, or to say that nothing was done. Something was effected, but at an infinite cost of time and opportunity. Even before the National Church became alive to its corporate responsibility, and before the notion of State autonomy was laid aside, three new States had been carved out of the national domain, and the churches within them had organized themselves and come into the federation. These were Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The missionary history of these is to be found by following the lives of two remarkable men.

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1792.

² White: Memoirs, Convention of 1792.

³ Gen. Con. Journal, 1808.

Two streams of emigration flowed westward. The first, from the meagre soil of New England, followed its own belt of latitude and settled in the basin of Lake Erie, and upon the interlacing tributaries of the Cuyahoga, the Muskingum, and the Maumee. New York reabsorbed her own emigrants within the Mohawk valley and her own broad lacustrine domain. The second and fuller tide flowed from the old Middle colonies into the Ohio valley proper, and southwestward toward the Gulf. The first of these carried Philander Chase; the second, James Harvey Otey.

Chase was of pure New England, Puritan stock, born on the bank of the upper Connecticut, reared hardly in a Vermont farmhouse, and graduated at Dartmouth College.¹ When in college in 1794, he, like Dr. Cutler had done at Yale, seventy years earlier, found, by chance, a Prayer-Book.² His study of it brought him to the Church. The young convert went home, upon his graduation, and convinced his father's house. He was ordained, and became at once the indomitable, eager, restless missionary and frontiersman which he remained until his life's end. Probably no man in the American Church has laid so many foundations. He tried his 'prentice hand in the new settlement on Lake George, and organized a parish there.¹ Among the stumps and cabins at Utica he laid down another; another in the presence of the wondering Indians at Canandaigua; another at Paris; another at Auburn. But his restless spirit soon bore him farther afield. He returned down the Hudson, and sailed away

¹ Bishop Chase: Reminiscences, second edition, vol. i. p. 7.

² Ib., vol. i. p. 16.

In New Orleans. to the far-off mouth of the Mississippi. The "Protestant Church" of New Orleans had already a loose organization. Chase drew its bands closer, persuaded it to come within the Protestant Episcopal Church, and became its rector.² His tireless labor, and his excursions far and wide through the swamps and bayous to the outlying settlements, brought him to death's door with a fever, from which he was recovered by a plentiful exhibition of "fixed air."³ When he brought his shattered body North, he was content to be a parish priest at Hartford only until, with returning strength, returned his "Western fever." In 1817 he started for the distant "Western Reserve." In midwinter, on horseback, and in a shakly pung, he crossed Connecticut and New York, bidding God-speed

Pioneer missionary in Ohio. to the churches he had gathered years before, stopped to rest at the half-dozen cabins of Buffalo, intrusted himself and his horse upon the ice of Lake Erie, was near being drowned more than once by the ice breaking through, and found his journey's end at Salem, Ohio.⁴ "There was not an Episcopalian in the place." Nothing daunted, when Sunday

¹ Bishop Chase: Reminiscences, vol. ii. p. 28.

² Ib., vol. i. p. 54.

³ Ib., vol. i. p. 98.

⁴ Ib., vol. i. p. 127.

came, he announced who he was and why he had come, gathered the people together, read prayers, telling the people how and when to respond, and delivered his message. The people "were much pleased with the prayers." There were already two clergy in the State, remote from him and from each other. For a year he went about from hamlet to hamlet, from clearing to clearing, gathered the Church people of whom he heard from time to time, established new posts, put himself in communication with the other missionaries, and in 1818, five clergy, constituting the whole force in the State, together with half a dozen laymen, met, organized a diocese, and elected Chase bishop. He was consecrated in Philadelphia, February 11, 1819. Then he plodded back on horseback, nearly freezing by the way, through York, McConnellsburg, Greensburg, and Pittsburg to Ohio, and began his life's work as bishop and backwoodsman. The frontiersmen were either indifferent or hostile to the Church. Indeed, Episcopalians formed a small proportion of the emigrants to the West. In the previous history of the country, the Church, as has been seen, had its strength mainly among the wealthy, official, aristocratic classes. These did not go West. It was the farmers, yeomanry, and mechanics who sought better fortune beyond the mountains. These were, for the most part, ignorant of the Church's ways and spirit. Few men have ever known so well as The frontier bishop. Bishop Chase how to win them. Once when he had appointed a service at a certain time at a distant place, he found, upon his arrival, that the hostile denominations had intentionally fixed a "Union Protracted Meeting," at the same time and place. When he came in it was in full blast. Fortunately he found on the outskirts of the crowd a Presbyterian gentleman, who did not at all approve of the tactics which his minister had used in fixing this meeting. By him the Bishop sent, courteously asking the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Methodist ministers present to come to him. When they came, sullen and pugnacious, he said, "I have come here by appointment to hold a service; I beg you will join with me in conducting it and making it profitable." Without waiting for a reply, he marched to the platform, with them at his heels, and announced: "Neighbors, I hold in one hand a Bible, in the other a Prayer-Book. The one teaches us how to live, the other how to pray. I know you are familiar with the one, I doubt if you are with the other. I have brought some dozens of copies with me. With the aid of these, my good brethren, I will try to lead you in the service. If any of you, through the depravity of the natural heart, are averse to being 'taught how to pray,' you need the teaching all the more on that very account. Without confession there is, as you know, no remission of sins. We will therefore confess our sins to Almighty God, all in the same voice. You will observe that no man can say 'Our Father' until he has confessed his faults; we will now say 'Our Father who art in heaven.' The proper attitude when we pray is upon our knees, as did Solomon, Daniel, Stephen, and Paul. After their example, I enjoin upon you all to fall upon your knees." And so the service proceeded, "the response from the great congregation being as the voice of many waters."

Did any good result from it? He "hopes so indeed; but much of the good was lost for want of shepherds to gather in the lambs."¹ As a man who knew his people, lived and loved their life, he travelled hither and thither, and laid the foundation of the Church in Ohio. The monument to his name is Kenyon College. He saw very early that the Church, to be successful among the people, must be home-bred. There was no place or way to train up a ministry; he would make one. When his plan was mature, he took the unheard-of step of going to England for the money needed. No such bishop had been seen there for a thousand years. His rugged simplicity awoke attention, and he became the rage. With the friendship of great men and noble ladies, with his pockets full of money, he came home and planted his seminary and college.² He built his brain and heart in it. But with its growth and success came a conflict between himself and his subordinates as to its management. Finally, after what seemed to him an unworthy and ungrateful thwarting of his wishes in the matter, he turned his back upon the noble institution which stood in the broad demesne that he had wrested from the wilderness, mounted his horse, and rode away into the backwoods of Michigan. His real work was among the primitive frontiersmen. But in Kenyon College and Jubilee College he laid foundations upon which other men ought long ago to have built strong towers for education and the Church. They were earliest on the ground.

¹ Reminiscences, vol. ii. p. 201.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 170.

They possessed the good-will and respect of the people among whom they were planted. But they have been overshadowed long since by the institutions of other faiths. Bishop Chase had done his work. Through him the Church in Ohio had been gathered, and received, not without questioning and hesitation, into the Federation which waited yet for such State Churches as might volunteer to come.

Kentucky had already come. Among its very earliest settlers had been a clergyman of the Church. The first Church in Kentucky. to enter its borders had been Episcopalians from Virginia. But they were early overrun by the stream of Scotch-Irish which poured over the Blue Ridge after the Revolution. These carried with them the antipathy to the Church which their fathers had brought across the ocean with them. It had not been lessened by the Revolution and the Indian wars. The "Episcopal Church" was linked in their minds with Tories, and with the British officers whom some of them had seen among the Indians when, in their own early life, they had been carried as prisoners to Detroit. They had learned their letters from a primer on the title-page of which was a cut of John Rogers at the stake, surrounded by his wife and children. The picture, with its moral, was as deeply fixed in their prejudices as was the alphabet in their memories.¹ The memory of the early missionary, murdered by the Indians, had faded out of the land.² But in 1794, a prominent Presbyterian minister, the first president of

¹ Roosevelt: Winning of the West, vol. i. p. 309.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 198.

Transylvania University, had come into the Church, been ordained, and ministered to the scattered people. A few years later a popular Methodist preacher had followed his example. But in the main the country was given over to the revivalism which came in during the last years of the "Great Awakening."¹ From time to time, at long intervals, adventurous clergy found their way among the uncouth backwoodsmen. In the larger towns a permanent lodgement was slowly effected. In 1829 the clergy of the region and lay representatives from Lexington, Louisville, and Danville met and organized the Church in Kentucky. Three parishes, with four ministers, composed its strength. They elected Benjamin Bosworth Smith to be their bishop, and another State was admitted to the federation.

James Harvey Otey was a gaunt, raw-boned, six-foot-three son of a Virginia farmer, the grandson of a Revolutionary soldier, born under the shadow of the Peaks of Otter. When he had graduated at the "University of North Carolina" he intrusted his life and fortune to the stream which was bearing the enterprise and vigor of his day to the West and South. The wares at his disposal were such as he had accumulated while at college. He moved to Franklin, Tenn., and became the pioneer school-teacher.² When thus employed he came in contact with one of the few passing priests, and was baptized. He went to North Carolina, and was ordained by Bishop Ravenscroft, the man

Bishop Otey.

¹ Tracy: The Great Awakening.

¹ Roosevelt: vol. i. p. 309.

² Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 7.

he loved above all others. When he returned to his school there was no Episcopal congregation in the State, and no other clergyman of his Church within two hundred miles of him.¹ His office was despised by the people among whom he lived, and his Church was held in contempt.² Curiosity drew the people to "hear the Episcopal minister pray, and his wife jaw back at him" in the responses.³ When they had come, however, Otey's splendid character and deep earnestness retained them. He was a man of the backwoodsmen's own sort. Once when he was asleep in a rude tavern, a local gambler waked him roughly and demanded his bed as his own. When the sleepy man demurred the gambler threatened to throw him out of the window. Then the sturdy priest thrust from under the cover a brawny arm, worthy of the Holy Clerk of Copmanhurst, and said: "Before you try to throw me out of the window, please feel that."⁴ His stalwart Christian manliness and sweet devotion made him and his Church respected. He was tireless and successful in laboring for its growth. In 1829, he, with two other clergymen, met in Nashville, and organized the Protestant Episcopal Church in Tennessee. When their number grew to five, they chose Otey bishop, and a new State was admitted to the federal Church. The churches in Mississippi put themselves under Bishop Otey's care. Like Chase in Ohio, he dreamed of a theological

¹ Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 42.

² Ib., p. 56: "I knew and felt at the time that I was looked upon with contempt, if not despised, by the great mass of the people."

³ Ib., p. 56.

⁴ Ib., p. 84.

school. He was a teacher by instinct and habit. He labored for years to establish Christian education. He left his impress upon the public schools of his own State and Mississippi. He founded a school for girls, and another for boys. But his own dream did not come true for many a year, when it was realized in the University of the South. In the first five years of his Episcopate the clergy of his diocese increased from five to twenty-one.¹ But a whole generation had meanwhile been lost to the Church.

To overtake the movement of population in the great West had already become well-nigh impossible. Unless the National Church should abandon its preconception of autonomous State Churches it never would be possible. As to the government of the churches already within the federation, the notion of State independence was already slowly disappearing. A movement toward centralization had long since set in unobserved. Powers were even now exercised by the General Convention without question, which had at first been assumed without question to belong to the States. The time had now come for the National Church to become a Propaganda. In 1835 it abandoned its impotent attitude of waiting for churches to come, and resolved to move out and build them. The General Convention, in that year, formally declared that every baptized member was ipso facto a missionary; constituted a Board of Managers who should represent the whole people; and provided for the sending missionary bishops in advance of any call for them.

The new departure
in 1835.

¹ Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 42.

The action was revolutionary. Through it, Episcopacy passed from the idea of a Federation of constituent State Churches to that of a National Church with component dioceses. It was not by accident that the question of the division of one of the original States into two or more dioceses arose at the same convention. Both actions sprang from the same source. The conception of the Church's structure had changed.¹ While the old theory obtained, its enthusiasm could not find expression. So long as it remained in the calm, cautious, constructive mood, that theory would suffice; but if ever its heart should be deeply stirred, it would change its way of thinking. That access of zeal had already come, and the old bottles could not contain the new wine.

¹ White: Memoirs, p. 405.

CHAPTER VIII.

NEW SPIRITUAL FORCES.

THE preaching of the Evangelical leaders "awaked the Church of England from its philosophical pride and lethargy."¹ The sleep had been so profound that it had looked like death. The repulsive picture of English church and social life in the last century need not again be drawn. In America things had never been so bad. The decencies of life had always been maintained here. But in the first years of the century the religious tone had been very low indeed. The Church had largely caught the spirit of the age. Those Meagre spiritual life. who reorganized it were men whose religious habits had been fixed under the old conditions. A very few were men of marked devotion, but, as a rule, they were content with a very low spiritual life, and entirely indifferent to doctrine.² The clergy hardly took their office seriously, and the laity feared "enthusiasm" so much that they were content with less than earnestness. Virginia rejected the "Proposed Book" because its rubric gave the minister the power to repel an evil liver from the Holy Communion. Maryland chose Dr. Smith its bishop, well knowing his questionable habits; and the

¹ Merivale: Four Lectures, London, 1879.

¹ Ryle: Christian Leaders in the Eighteenth Century.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 188.

General Convention, with the same knowledge, elected him its president. Bishop Provoost lived for years in neglect of the offices of the Church, and Bishop Madison was currently believed to be an infidel. The ecclesiastical precision of Bishop Seabury and the Connecticut clergy made them earnest to preserve the Church's purity in doctrine and discipline rather than the vigor of its life. A spiritual motive force was needed to carry the new Church into and through its Titanic task of ministering to the needs of a new nation. Such a force had begun to show itself in England in the darkest days of the last century, and was destined in the first quarter of the present one to dominate the American Church.

The "Holy Club," which Wesley joined at Oxford, was only one of many similar groups of earnest-minded men who prayed for light in the midst of abounding gloom. The group to which Wesley belonged pursued its own course. He and his following started upon a path which led them outside the Church of England. But the great majority, his peers in zeal and wisdom, remained within. Wesley's path and theirs ran parallel a little way, but soon diverged. Methodists and Evangelicals had quite as many points of difference as of likeness.¹ They were different stocks from the same root. The Evangelical fathers could not march with Wesley. He turned from them with impatience when they refused to break away from the old order.² His methods were equally distasteful to them. The hypercritical Hervey and the learned, decorous Romaine were men of an altogether different type from Ingham, the Yorkshire evangelist, and Asbury, the itinerant revivalist.¹ It was Venn, the faithful parish priest and writer of the robust "Complete Duty of Man," Scott, the staid curate of Olney, Milner, the Church historian, Simeon, the missionary, and such as these who were the fathers of the Evangelicals. Their influence was dominant in the English Church when this century opened. They lifted its sodden body from the mire of the Georgian era, set its feet upon a rock, and established its goings. They had their peculiar cant, as all religious parties have, but they secured an attention which other language would hardly have compelled. A mode of presenting Christianity which could compel the assent of human beings so far unlike as Dr. Johnson and Hannah More must needs be potent. The two salient features of the school were its con-Their differ- ceptions of the personal Christian life, and of entiate. the function of the Church. As to the first of these, it laid emphasis upon Conversion. Like Roger Williams and Jonathan Edwards, like the Moravians and Wesley, it conceived the starting-point to be a conscious experience. Their system had for its background the Augustinian dogma of total depravity. John Newton, the converted slave-trader, was its type. The good priest Thomas Scott, already of saintly life, must needs be "converted" after years of a useful ministry.²

¹ Abbey and Overton: Church of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. ii. p. 168.

² Ib., vol. ii. p. 190.

¹ Tyerman: Oxford Methodists, p. 332.

² Seely: Later Evangelical Fathers, p. 160.

² Petitions were publicly offered in the "Prayer Meetings" of certain Philadelphia parishes for the "conversion" of Bishop White when he was already a patriarch!

When Simeon gained a scholarship at King's College, Cambridge, and confronted the legal duty of receiving the Lord's Supper, he shrinks away in terror. He buys the old "Whole Duty of Man," and makes himself ill with reading, fasting, and praying. He Conscious experience. "sought to lay his sins on the sacred head of Jesus, and on the Wednesday began to have a hope of mercy; on Thursday that hope increased; on the Friday and Saturday it became more strong; on the Sunday morning peace flowed in rich abundance into my soul."¹ This is typical. Milner expands the individual experience and traces it in his history of the Church. Heretofore, he contends, men have written the story of the Church as they would the annals of an empire. He will distinguish between the real and nominal Christians, leave the latter to one side, and trace the Church through the former.²

But the exploitation of the personal experience did not blind them to the use of the Church. Scott maintained the weekly Communion at a time when it was generally neglected.³ Simeon "had the sweetest access to God through my blessed Saviour at the Lord's table." But he brings his previous experience into the closest relation with it. When the priest gave him a piece left over of the consecrated bread, after the service, "I put it into my mouth, covered my face with my hand, and prayed. The clergyman, seeing it, smiled at me; but I thought that if he had felt such a load taken off his soul as I had, he would not deem my praises superfluous."

¹ Seely: Later Evangelical Fathers, p. 238.

² Abbey and Overton: English Church in Eighteenth Century, vol. ii. p. 210.

³ Seely: Later Evangelical Fathers, p. 168.

The place assigned by them to personal experience, of course, gave the Evangelicals a peculiar relation to Christians outside their own or any church. Whoever was ready to testify to his own conscious connection with Christ must needs be accepted as a brother. No one might go behind the man's own testimony, — unless, indeed, his life should grossly discredit it. This led them to relations with other churches, which induced those who claim for the Church an original jurisdiction in the religious life to distrust their purpose. Simeon, when he goes to Scotland, has Presbyterians for his friends, and joins with them in the Sacrament without hesitation.¹ But he at once turns to his brethren in the Church and explains. He holds that an English clergyman may preach in the Established Church of Scotland, in which his king must worship, if there. Besides that, he declares with earnestness, that after every such experience he "returns to the use of the Liturgy perfectly astonished at the vast superiority of our own mode of worship."² The men of this school, both in England and America, were always emphatic in protesting their loyalty to the Church. They must be allowed to have known their own minds, and to have spoken sincerely.

Low Churchmen. But they did not always get themselves believed. They gave their allegiance to the Church from use and wont, from conviction of her better ways and methods. But it was with them an act of choice. In the background of their minds was always the feeling that they might innocently have chosen otherwise. The people, with that rough accuracy which belongs to popular judgment, called them low Churchmen. Their Churchmanship was a matter of their own election, and not of obligation.¹ The high Churchman distrusted them, not because of their present conduct, but from fear of the latent mischief which might any day spring from their reservation of the possibility of choice. To his mind, it was not a region where a choice was allowable.

¹ Seely: Later Evangelical Fathers, p. 265.

² Ib., p. 264.

In an age when the spiritual life of the Church was well-nigh extinct, only such men could revive it. They believed with all their souls in the awful doom which awaited every unconverted man. They believed that every man might be aroused and set to work out the tragedy of salvation in his own conscious life. This gave to the words of earnest men, as it needs must, a pathos and entreaty which told. Two generations later the Evangelical School, as such, had practically disappeared. By that time the Church, which it had waked into life, had been taken by the hand by other leaders, and led in another direction. They looked after her sadly, for they loved her. They felt that she had been beguiled away from their safer guardianship. But the truth was that their decadence, when it came, was not due so much to the triumph of a rival ecclesiasticism, as to the fact that a far deeper change had taken place in the mind of the religious world. The Evangelicals had been Calvinists.

Cause of their decline.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 140.

When the people ceased to believe the Augustinian anthropology, the motive to which they had appealed had gone.¹ Their preaching, which had so deeply stirred a generation which had believed itself to be "totally depraved," failed to move a generation which had come into a truer way of thinking about itself. Salvation had come to be thought of less as a rescue from impending doom, and more as an education in righteousness. The dread of future torment became less easy to awake. The "larger hope" embodied itself at first in a crude universalism. A soi-disant church sprang up with this belief for its foundation and title, and for a while grew strong. But what truth was in it diffused itself through the Christian world, and Universalism declined. A truer estimate of man's complex nature began to obtain. This fundamental change of view coincided in point of time with the fresh presentation of the Church as an authoritative teacher and guide. When this had come about, men turned away from the Evangelicals. In the first quarter of the century, they thrived apace; in the second, they encountered a rival too strong for them; in the third, they began to decline.

In 1835, the period at which the Church adjusted her machinery of propagandism, their vigor was at its best. The tracts and leaflets of Bishop Porteus, himself a
 Thomas
 Scott. Virginian, had been eagerly read by Virginians. Thomas Scott, the rector of Aston Sanford, Bucks, to eke out his meagre salary, had written the famous Commentary from which so many millions have received their theology. It had a circulation hardly paralleled in literary history. Before his death, in 1821, the English edition had reached twelve thousand copies, and the American more than twenty-five thousand.¹ The "Great Awakening" and the Methodist movement had prepared the way for Evangelical work. Rev. Joseph Pilmore, once a Wesleyan preacher, had taught it in Philadelphia.² Dr. Percy, one time a chaplain of Lady Huntingdon, had proclaimed it in South Carolina. William Duke, a Methodist while the Methodists remained in the Church, had preached it in Maryland. Bishop Griswold commended it by his deep piety in New England, outside of Connecticut. But the great apostle was Bishop Meade of Virginia. It was the motive power of his own earnestly religious life.³ For years, almost single-handed, he had labored, and successfully, to revive the old Virginia Church. Now he was the Evangelical champion in the National Church. The founding of the Virginia Seminary gave their distinctive doctrines a home. In Dr. Wilmer, its chief teacher, they found a fit and winning expositor.⁴ Hopkins, Boyd, Bull, and Bedell in Pennsylvania; Milnor and Channing Moore in New York; McIlvaine in Brooklyn; Tyng, Bristed, and Crocker in New England, all poured their evangelical fervor into the Church's life.⁵ The striking success of Chase in Ohio, in spite of the sustained opposition of Bishop Hobart, had given it éclat. It was at its best in mind and heart.

¹ The Churchman: vol. v. p. 856.

¹ Abbey and Overton: Church of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. ii. p. 206.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 192.

³ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 255. (Dr. Sparrow's Sermon.)

⁴ Memoirs of Dr. Tyng, p. 70.

⁵ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 193.

But, meanwhile, a stream of renewed life had set in from another quarter. The hard and narrow Church-manship of the Tory school had been taken up by Bishop Hobart of New York and his followers. Their broader spirit and deeper devotion made it more humane. Bishop Seabury's task had been to stand out for the organizing principle of the Church. But his eye, from being so long and so persistently fixed upon a single point, had lost the power of looking afield. By the political circumstance in which he and his had been set, they had been isolated from contemporary life. Bishop Hobart was as uncompromising a Churchman as Seabury, but he was a man of his time. He brought the Episcopal Church into harmony with the spirit of modern life. In the report upon the state of the Church for 1820, the State upon which he had left his impress shows more life and work than all the rest together.¹ One hundred and eighteen organized churches, twenty-four deacons, and fourteen priests ordained, fifteen hundred persons confirmed, a flourishing mission among the Oneida Indians, Bible societies, Prayer-Book societies, Sunday-school unions and the foundation for a theological seminary, show the presence of a new force. Being set in charge of Connecticut temporarily, he carried there, also, the same broad sympathy, tireless energy, ready adaptability, — the elements which the Church of Bishop Seabury needed. His conception of the Church colored the stream of emigration which flowed steadily westward following the latitude of his own State.

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1820.

Away to the south, a man of more fiery zeal, but holding fast to the same idea of Episcopacy,¹ revived the work in North Carolina. Bishop Ravenscroft left his mark on the Church in the South and Southwest.² Otey, the pioneer bishop of that great region, who had sat at his feet and loved him as a father, caught his spirit and passed it on to his own successor.

There had now emerged in the Church two broadly distinguished types of thought and life. With the death of Bishop White, in 1836, the last survivor of the old "opportunist" school passed away. The future now for a generation lay between Evangelicals and High Churchmen. The line of cleavage did not run sharply through the mass. The two contrasted principles mingled in varying proportions in individuals. The same man might, and often did, embrace them both. He held to the conscious religious life with the Evangelical, and dreamed of ecclesiastical empire with the High Churchman. Indeed, in all the controversies of the period, each makes a point of asserting that he held to the principles of the other, — modified and corrected by his own. But two spirits strove within the Church. When action was necessary, party lines were drawn. When the High Churchmen took up the Sunday-school Union, the Evangelicals, disturbed at Bishop Hobart's Catechism, and scandalized by the mutilation of Mrs. Sherwood's books, started an Evangelical Knowledge Society as an offset.³ When this grew influ-

The two parties.

¹ Norton: Life of Bishop Ravenscroft, p. 95.

² Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 192.

² The Churchman, March 17, 1832.

³ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 225.

ential, the other side set up the Churchman's Library.¹ They worked and planned together to organize the new machinery of missions: but when the Evangelicals began to suspect that they had been outmanœuvred, they set up a rival volunteer society.² Their enthusiasm had already found a vent in foreign missions. Through their beloved Simeon and Henry Martyn, the religious world had been stirred with pity for heathenness. This was the field into which the Evangelical could move far more readily than could the pronounced High Churchman. The purpose which he set before himself, to awaken individual souls and lead them one by one to establish relations with God, required little machinery. All that was needed was to find a godly man who should go and "tell them the story of the Cross." In 1822 a mission to Africa was determined upon, but no ship could be found to carry out Ephraim Bacon and his wife. In 1834 the Rev. Henry Lockwood sailed to China, where this Church has now twenty-two native clergy. With the single exception of the abortive attempt in Turkey, all the foreign mission enterprises were manned from the Virginia Seminary.³ A tacit understanding had been reached that this should be the field of the Evangelicals, while the High Churchmen should exploit the home field.⁴ There does not seem to have been any conscious strategy in this arrangement, but it acted directly in the interest of High Churchmanship, which

Division of labor.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 230.

² Ib., p. 200.

³ Ib., p. 197.

⁴ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 194.

for a long time steadily gained ground. While its opponents' energy was directed elsewhere, it moved northwest and southwest, crossed the Mississippi, and has since been dominant. The Rising Churchmanship. Low Churchmen's expectation that they should secure at least one of the two new missionary bishoprics was disappointed.¹

The Church's forces moved out, under the new leaders, to win the mighty West. To trace in detail the steps by which they covered the prairies, climbed the Rocky Mountains, and went with the gold-hunters to the Pacific, would require a volume. The roll of the missionaries' names would fill a book. The Church simply followed the emigrant, often lagging far behind him, but keeping him in sight while her strength would hold out. When he had built his cabin, she sought him out in it. When the great cities sprang up in the wilderness, she entered into them and built her house. When the savage Indian was restrained, and fixed to a permanent abode, she did her share to make him human and Christian. She met a various welcome for her proffered gifts. Peoples who knew neither her nor her fathers founded new communities, and she could not speak their speech or win their friendship. Other churches entered the new field beside her, before her, and behind her. She often failed where they succeeded. She often succeeded after their success had changed to failure. It may fairly be said of her that she has striven with an honest heart to do her share in making and keeping the new America Christian. In the long, strenuous task, she has more and more sharply emphasized her churchly aspect.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 200.

¹ Meade: Old Churches, p. 379.

When Chase reached the new land of Ohio, in 1817, it seemed natural for him to begin his work at "Covenant Creek" by calling together his neighbors for the preaching of the Word, and the Prayers. When Breck and his companions laid down their packs under an elm-tree in Minnesota, in 1850, it seemed equally natural and fitting to them to "erect a rustic cross, build a rude altar of rough stones, and begin their work by the celebration of the Eucharistic Feast."

CHAPTER IX.

THE CATHOLIC RENAISSANCE.

BETWEEN 1835 and the War of the Rebellion, the Church adjusted its manner of life to its changed conception of its constitution. When it had determined to send missionary bishops to the unappropriated West, it abandoned the attitude of a federation waiting for new units to propose themselves for membership. For the future it intended to act as a National Church. When it divided one of the old integers, and made a second diocese in New York, the old conception of State churches became no longer possible.

“The change was fundamental. The analogy between ‘States’ and ‘dioceses’ was thereby broken down. Not only did the idea of diocesan sovereignty thus receive a serious shock, but in proportion to the weakening of the dioceses by subdivision was the power of the General Church increased.”¹ The change was made, so far as can be seen, without a dissenting voice. It only recorded a change which had already occurred in people’s way of thinking. The Church was becoming less an abstraction and more an entity. From many directions influences were converging to bring out this idea into distinct consciousness. The nation was becoming consolidated, and the Church centralized. One of the capital powers originally reserved to the States was assumed by the General Church, without challenge, when it provided for the trial and deposition of a diocesan bishop.¹ Possibly the grotesque result of a diocesan trial, just had, may have influenced this change. The Bishop of Kentucky had been presented under an accusation of falsehood. There were three charges against him, of one hundred and ninety-eight specifications.² The astounding verdict of the court chosen by the diocese had been: "Guilty; but without the least criminality!"³ Under the changed law the Bishop of Pennsylvania was tried and suspended for drunkenness. His brother, the Bishop of New York, was tried and suspended for lasciviousness. The Bishop of New Jersey was three times presented, and twice brought before a court, but without trial, upon charges affecting his integrity. All these trials, which at the time occupied the general attention, served to fix the popular mind upon the General Church, which was the party prosecuting. It came to be looked to as the sole source of authority in matters of discipline. It was but a step to thinking likewise of its authority in doctrine and life. The religion of Church people was unconsciously taking a deeper ecclesiastical tinge. The Church was becoming more sharply differentiated, not only from the world, but from the current forms of American Christianity.

¹ Dr. Francis Wharton, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 401.

Trial of
bishops.

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 278.

² The Churchman, vol. vii. No. 38.

³ "Sentence of the Court in the case of the Diocese of Kentucky vs the Right Rev. B. B. Smith."

Prayer-Book societies were actively sustained in Pennsylvania and New York. Their purpose was not solely to teach men how to pray. A second purpose, which soon stepped up beside the primary one, was to propagate the Church. Tract societies which had this for their avowed object began to be popular.¹ "Nova Anglicana" wrote long articles against the Puritans. Dr. Muhlenberg's broad, catholic spirit began to make itself felt upon his pupils. The elder Bishop Doane and Dr. Croswell struck the same note in their hymns and sonnets that Keble did in his "Christian Year."² Professor Doane of Trinity College was the first to welcome Keble in America. He had anticipated his motive. Dr. Coxe soon carried the theme to its highest note and sweetest harmony, in his "Christian Ballads." Professor Whittingham at the General Seminary marshalled the facts of Church history to the same end. Bishop Hopkins, the keenest of controversialists, wrote the "Primitive Creed" and the "Primitive Church." Dr. Francis L. Hawks gathered up the Church record of colonial times. Bishop Onderdonk carried on a pamphlet war with Presbyterians about the divine right of Episcopacy.³ Books of sacramental devotion began to come in. Bishop Griswold's and Bishop Meade's Family Prayers continued to sell, but Bishop Hobart's "Companion for the Altar" outsold them both.⁴ The great Temperance enthusiasm which was agitating the world, preaching idea.

The Church

¹ The Churchman: vol. v. p. 835.

² Rev. Julius H. Ward, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 615.

³ The Churchman, vol. v. p. 816.

⁴ Ib., vol. v., advertisements, passim.

total abstinence as a duty and denouncing the use of fermented wine at the Holy Communion, called public attention to the Church's different way of dealing with this and kindred subjects.¹ A new collection of Hymns, chiefly the selection² of Dr. Muhlenberg and Bishop Onderdonk, had now been long enough in use to infuse Increasing activity. a more distinctive churchly sentiment among the people. Church schools were springing up on every hand. Dr. Muhlenberg was fixing the type of them at Flushing Institute. Bristol College advertised that it was so full that no more students could be accommodated.³

Parish machinery for Church work was set up everywhere, — female sewing societies, missionary societies, aid societies, benevolent societies, — until an English Church paper ridicules the movement by declaring that a church in Boston had started a “Ladies' Anti-young-man-standing-at-the-church-door Society.”⁴ The Bishop of New York issued a plea for free churches in the interest of church extension, and his plea was opposed from Philadelphia on the ground that not propagation but edification was the pressing need.⁵ The attention of the whole Church was kept fixed by the General Missionary Society upon the needs of the West. It cries out with shame that while the town of St. Louis is ready and anxious to have a minister, there is not one in the whole State of Missouri;⁶ that there is

¹ The Churchman, vol. ii. p. 906.

² Ayres: Life of Dr. Muhlenberg, p. 84.

³ The Churchman, vol. v. p. 835.

⁴ Ib., vol. v. p. 858.

⁵ Ib., vol. vi. pp. 1070, 1174.

⁶ Ib., vol. v. p. 898.

but one in the State of Mississippi. It announces with enthusiasm that a strong parish has been organized in Mobile and another hopeful one in Memphis; and that the Rev. Mr. Salmon has just started from Western New York, with a little company of fifteen families, to found a Church colony in Texas.¹

Four-legged Communion tables were going out, and solid oaken ones were coming in. In a few churches stone altars began to appear. The black Change of manners. academic gown began to give place to the white priestly robe as the dress of the officiating minister. The surplice, which had been split down the front a century before, so that it might be put on without deranging the befloured wigs, was now sewed up again, and on its breast began to show some churchly emblem. Memorials began to come up to have its use made obligatory.² Bishop Hobart criticises the Virginians for their neglect of ornaments, and Bishop Meade defends them. He urges that de minimis non curat lex: that Bishop Hobart himself sometimes dispensed not only with his robes but with his gown as well; that he had the high example of the Archbishop of Canterbury for ordaining deacons in their every-day dress; and that Bishop Moore had never worn any uniform, save when performing distinctively episcopal acts.³ Both the criticism and the defence show the drift.

The emergence of the idea of corporate religion as distinguished from individual salvation directed attention

¹ The Churchman: vol. vi. p. 1046.

² Johns: Life of Bishop Meade. p. 240.

³ Ib., pp. 240, 241

both to the ministry and to the machinery of the Church. Nor was this drift toward corporate action in religion confined to the Episcopal Church. Corporate religion. It was moving in the Christian world. The Methodists were gathering their scattered forces into an ecclesiastical empire,¹ and lamenting the decadence of the personal enthusiasm which had marked the men of the previous generation. In 1832 a General Synod had taken up into itself the particular synods of the Reformed Church.² Ten years earlier the Reformed Presbyterians had organized their Presbyteries into a General Synod.³ The question of constitutional right, which in 1837 split it asunder, was agitating the Presbyterian General Assembly.⁴ The last step in the centralization of the Roman Church was coming within the range of practical politics, in the dogma of Papal Infallibility. The old churches of Sir Christopher Wren were being replaced by a higher ecclesiastical architecture. The current of religious feeling was setting steadily away from the sharp individualism of Edwards and Whitefield and Wesley and the Great Awakening, and the Evangelicals, toward the thought of solidarity among those who are being saved.

The set was already evident, when the "Oxford The "Oxford Movement." Movement" came. It changed the current into a flood. Its effect upon Church life has been so enormous that it should be traced from its origin.

¹ Stevens: History of Methodism, pp. 520, 582.

² Manual of the Reformed Church in America, third edition, p. 73.

³ Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia, p. 1908.

⁴ Schaff-Herzog, p. 1908.

In 1825 the Church of England was dominated by a devout but meagre Calvinism. Its political life was tossed and threatened by the wave of liberalism which had broken over France a generation earlier. Many sagacious men feared that forces were moving in society which were hostile to religion itself. They believed that the current mode of presenting Christianity could not prevail against them. They believed the Church to be in special danger. They had no confidence in its recognized champions. All sorts of Church "Reforms" were afloat. One proposed the abolition of church rates. Another offered to expel the bishops from Parliament. Another proposed entire separation of Church and State. Another offered to unite all sects with the Church by act of Parliament, and give them the use of church buildings conjointly.¹ A Roman Catholic Relief Bill and a Reform Bill were pending. In 1833 ten Irish bishoprics were suppressed. The same year a little group of men met in the Common Room of Oriel College, Oxford, to form an "Association for vindicating the Rights of the Church and restoring the Knowledge of Sound Principles."²

The company were bound together only by the bond of a common purpose. That was declared in the title of the association. To reach their end each man was free to walk in his own road. Some gave their adhesion to the association after it was founded; some never formally joined it at all. Their names have become known the world over: — Froude,

The "Tractarians."

¹ Stephens: Life of Dean Hook, p. 106, et seq.

² Ib., p. 107.

Keble, Palmer, Rose, Pusey, and, greatest of all, Newman. Their object was to restore the Church's true doctrine. They held that, at present at least, emphasis was laid upon doubtful or untenable dogmas, while the abiding truths, the truths which belonged to the Church pre-eminently, had been allowed to fall into obscurity. These last were the ones, they maintained, about which must be fought the battle against infidelity. They set about to re-state them, in a series of "Tracts for the Times." What the doctrines were may be seen from the titles of the Tracts. They were such as these: Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission; The Catholic Church; Archbishop Ussher on Prayers for the Dead; On Baptismal Regeneration; On Apostolical Succession; On the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist; On Purgatory; On Reserve in communicating Religious Knowledge; On Fasting; On Holy Baptism.¹

The Tracts were for the most part from Newman's pen.² When they first began to appear, they were hailed with welcome by the men who, throughout the kingdom, were dissatisfied with the existent life. But they presently became disturbing. The fear arose that if the English Church should be rehabilitated by these men, her children would not be able to recognize her in her new dress. This apprehension became a certainty when Newman put out Tract No. XC. In it he sustained the thesis that the teachings of the Thirty-nine Articles, "though the offspring of an uncatholic age, are, to say the least, not uncatholic, and may be subscribed to by those who aim at being catholic in heart and doctrine.”¹ What he meant by “catholic” became evident from the text. It meant something which plain men could not distinguish from Romish. This had been steadfastly denied by the Tractarians.

¹ Tracts for the Times: 6 vols., Rivingtons, 1834.

² Steplens: Life of Dean Hook, p. 111.

The Via Media. They had maintained that there was a Via Media, a middle path, between Rome and Protestantism,—that this middle term was Catholicity. But to the Tractarians this middle ground could not be satisfactory. They sought a position for the Church from which it could beat back the forces of liberalism. They found that Liberalism and Protestantism were the same in essence. The heart of each was private judgment as against authority. Newman came to see this before his fellows did. His quarrel was not with the current doctrine or practice of the Church, but with what he conceived to be a fatal tendency in society itself. “My battle was with Liberalism.
Newman's purpose. By Liberalism I mean the anti-dogmatic spirit and its development. It is scarcely now a party; it is the educated lay world. It is nothing else than that deep, plausible skepticism which is the development of human reason as practically exercised by the natural man.”²

His was a profound distrust of the spirit of the age. Against the incoming of this spirit he could see no barrier which he thought to be sufficient. He appealed therefore from the world to the Church, and from the Church of the present to the Church of the past.

¹ Introduction to Tract No. XC.

² Apologia: New York, Catholic Publishing House, p. 285.

Under his leadership a company of choice spirits set out upon a voyage of discovery through the centuries in search of a church which would be true enough to teach men, and strong enough to govern them. A deep interest had lately been awakened in the middle ages by the romances of Sir Walter Scott.¹ The wizard had cast a glamour over the pre-Reformation Church. With a profound disbelief in present inspiration, the Tractarians adventured hopefully to find a pure and perfect church at some point in the past.

It is a common belief that a wish to reform glaring abuses then existent in the Church was a co-operative motive. There is little evidence of the existence of such abuses, and none of any attempt to reform them. It was not a beautiful age, but the Church in England and America seems to have been discharging her practical duties relatively as well as in any age.² The leaders of the "Oxford Movement" did not burden themselves with reform of evil manners. They had a different aim. Men could only be safe in thought and conduct when led by a visible Divine Authority. No trustworthy authority was extant; they would find one in a restored and reconstructed Church. They gathered the materials for such a church painfully from various places and dates, and put them together in an ideal which they called a not reformers.

Tractarians

¹ Fisher: History of Christian Church, p. 630.

² Mozley: Reminiscences, ch. ii.

² Newman's account of his own religious life, Apologia: p. 56,
". . . Thomas Scott, to whom, humanly speaking, I owe my soul."

² Froude: Short Studies, Scribners, 1883, p. 156.

² Dean Hook: Life, pp. 99, 103.

² Beardsley: History of the Church in Connecticut, vol. ii. p. 244.

Via Media between liberalism and papalism, between Protestantism and Romanism as they then were. This ideal was abandoned with scorn by its constructors, who went away by opposite roads, Newman and his friends to Rome, Froude and his friends to infidelity, Hook and his friends to the work they had been doing before the movement began.

Before his departure Newman made a present of his Via Media: "Whether the ideas of the coming age upon religion be true or false, they will be real. In the present day mistiness is the mother of wisdom. A man who can set down half a dozen general propositions, which escape from destroying one another only by being diluted into truisms; who can hold the balance between opposite sides so skilfully as to do without fulcrum or beam; who never enunciates a truth without guarding himself against being supposed to exclude its contradictory; who holds that Scripture is the only authority, yet that the Church is to be deferred to; that faith only justifies, yet that it does not justify without works; that grace does not depend on the sacraments, yet is not given without them; that bishops are a divine ordinance, yet those who have them not are in the same religious condition as those who have;—this state of things cannot go on if men are to read and think. They cannot go on forever standing on one leg, or sitting without a chair, or walking with their feet tied, or grazing like Tityrus' stags in the air. They will take one view or other, but it will be a consistent view."¹

¹ Apologia, p. 144.

Those who fell heir to this contemptuous gift brought it to America. Upon its arrival here it found, in rough, three classes of Churchmen, at whose hands it received a various reception.¹

There were, first, the Evangelicals, who had drawn their inspiration from the same pietistic revival which had originally revolted the Tractarians. These turned away from it with anger and contempt. To their minds the very principle of authority was abhorrent, and of all authorities, ecclesiastical was the worst.

There were, second, the Laudian, non-juring, Seabury type, who gave it a guarded and cautious welcome. Its seeming reverence for antiquity appeared to them to be a desirable re-enforcement to their spirit of conservatism. But this class was small in numbers and in influence. The men who had once belonged to it had been succeeded by men of Hobart's school. Their vigorous Americanism, and their absorption in practical work, prevented the mass of High Churchmen from becoming either doctrinaires or ritualists.

In the third place were the distinctly American Churchmen. The principle of Authority, in the Oxford sense, was not grateful to them; but they were accustomed to a legally regulated liberty. This class embraced a large proportion of the clergy and most of the laity. They had been accustomed to think and speak of themselves as Protestants. They possessed to a marked degree that broad, practical, clear-sighted wisdom which had belonged to the first generation of English reformers. They differed widely from their contemporary English Churchmen. There was hardly any class there to which they corresponded. They had not been reared upon Evangelicalism; but no more were they Anglo-Catholics. They called themselves Episcopalians. It was rather the Church's present life than its past history which attracted and held them. Antiquity did not, to their minds, carry obligation with it. They compared the Church with the other forms which Christianity presented here in America, and it commended itself to their judgments and consciences. They neither hailed nor feared the Oxford Movement for themselves, but they were often disturbed by the phenomena which it produced in the Church which they loved. Chiefly they feared that if it prevailed it would set the Church in hopeless antagonism to their Protestant neighbors. For, while they did not declaim against the Pope, and thought it ill-bred to call Rome the scarlet whore, they did not shut their eyes to the fact that they were more akin to Protestantism than they were to her.

¹ Peiry: History, vol. ii. p. 192-4.

But from all of these groups the movement drew recruits. It drew as with a magnet a certain type of men. They who loved symmetry of doctrine so much that they could hold to a system in spite of the contradictory facts of human life; they who distrusted themselves and shrank from the labor of ordering their own religious conduct; they whose imagination was kindled by the thought of a visible, holy, dominant, spiritual mistress, — these were attracted by that method of living whose rationale had been stated in Dean Hook's sermon before the Queen, "Hear the Church."¹ This principle being accepted, an importance and a value were attributed to the rules, rituals, ordinances, and offices of the Church, which these did not have before. They became obligatory, not only or chiefly because they were intrinsically fit or excellent, but because they were of authority. Possessing such wisdom and power, the "Church" should, through her ordinances and officials, touch each soul at every point and moment of its earthly history.

That no objective fact does now, or ever has, corresponded to this ideal of the "Church," did not disturb those who were under the domination of the Anglo-Catholics. They chose from one century of the past one feature, and another from another, and combined them into their simulacrum. They were not in love, after all, with any outward mistress, but with an inward habit of prostration. Nor did the fact that Newman had declared the position indefensible, and abandoned it, disturb them. They were not logicians. They had not been drawn to their position by argument, nor would they be driven from it by a syllogism. Their instinct was wiser than their acts. The vitality of the movement lay in the fact that it was an honestly meant attempt to bring the Church of England out of its isolation, and into harmony with the Christian life of the ages. But they who joined in it became so engrossed with the task of re-establishing connection with the past that they fell out of sympathy with the Christian life of the present. They adopted an offensive cant. Terms so old that they had become new and strange found the place of honor in their vocabulary. The very term "catholic" upon their lips misled. Their whole speech was strange. Their peculiar distribution of emphasis among doctrines; their manner of conducting services; the way in which they set forth the Church's attitude to the Christian world, — Time of strife. all these raised a storm of strife which lasted half a century. Bishops charged against them;¹ and bishops came to their rescue.² Bishop McIlvaine controverted the new views in his "Oxford Theology." Dr. Sparrow dissected them in his class-room at the Virginia Seminary. Dr. John S. Stone, in his "Christian Sacraments," said the final word for the Evangelical side. The Evangelical Knowledge Society was founded as a counteracting propaganda.

¹ Stephens: Life of Dean Hook, p. 251. .

On the other side Dr. Hugh Davey Evans spoke the most potent words in "The True Catholic." Dr. Kip sent forth the "Double Witness of the Church." Dr. Wainwright defended the position that "There cannot be a Church without a Bishop."³

In all this the good providence, which had been working fifty years to cement the loose federation into a compact whole, became evident. A generation earlier, the same strain would have rent the Church in pieces. Had the State autonomy, which once existed, still survived, the bond of union would have snapped. In 1844, the

¹ Beardsley: History of Church in Connecticut, vol. ii. p. 329.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 258.

¹ Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 66.

² Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 269.

³ Julius H. Ward, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 619.

matter was brought formally before the General Convention.¹ The Church was asked to speak her mind upon "the serious errors in doctrine which have within a few years been introduced and extensively promulgated by means of tracts, the press, and the pulpit." After days of debate, with resolutions, amendments, amendments to amendments, substitutes and divisions, the Convention dismissed the subject with the declaration, in effect, that the Church's formularies show her doctrine clearly enough for any one to comprehend who wants to comprehend; and that "the Church is not responsible for the errors of individuals, whether they be members of this Church or not."²

Whether the things in dispute were really "errors" in doctrine remained undecided. It remains undecided yet. But it seemed clear to most that their introduction imported grave danger to the Church. It was feared that they would make of her a training-school for Rome. For some years, that seemed likely. For two centuries the Roman Church had been a feeble and insignificant factor in American life. With the decadence of Lord Baltimore's colony in the seventeenth century, it had well-nigh gone out. But its hierarchy had now been established for more than sixty years. During these years it had grown so slowly that it had attracted little attention. But when the tide of Irish immigration set in in 1848, Romanism began to flourish. Anglo-Catholicism and Roman Catholicism came in together. Many feared that there was a relationship between them. It began to seem so.¹ In England, as a direct consequence of the revived ecclesiasticism, such great names as Newman, Manning, Oakley, Faber, Wilberforce, Palmer, and Ward passed from the Church's rolls to the lists of Rome. In America, Bishop Ives of North Carolina, and a group of men of lesser station but greater character, followed in the same path. But the general apostacy for which many looked did not occur. The facts seemed to point to a different outcome, as the event has shown. The sum total of the losses to the Roman Catholic Church in Great Britain up to 1888, including clergy and laity, men and women, falls below two thousand. That is to say, an average of thirty-five persons per year have left the Church of England for Rome during the last sixty years. One large parish church would hold them all, living and dead. The loss from the American Church has been much less, both absolutely and in proportion. Nor is it speaking beyond bounds to say that for every one thus lost, five have come from Rome to the Church. The defection was greatest at its beginning, both in numbers and still more in quality. Since then it has steadily fallen off.²

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1844.

² Ib.

How much of the revived ecclesiasticism which marks the century is to be referred to the Oxford Movement, and

¹ Brand: Life of Bishop Whittingham, vol. ii. p. 353, et seq.

² Quarterly Review, No. 331, p. 31, et seq.

² Cf. Our Losses, a letter to the Rev. J. A. Canon Wenham, by Rev. G. Bampfield.

Annals of the Catholic Hierarchy in England and Scotland: by W. Maziere Brady.

Converts to Rome: W. Gordon Gorman.

The Present State of the Church in England: by Lord Bray.

The Catholic Directory: London, 1888.

how much to the influences at work antecedently and outside of it, cannot be known. Nor can the goal to which it tends be clearly seen as yet. The process had not run its course within the period of this book. It has not done so yet. But it affected the Protestant Episcopal Church profoundly, both for good and ill. On the one hand, it recalled men from the selfish pursuit of salvation as isolated individuals, and warned them that even in religion "no man liveth unto himself alone." It brought into clear view the obscured truth of the community of the saints, semper, ubique, et ab omnibus. It imported a new reverence into divine worship and uncovered the meaning of Christ's Sacraments.

On the other hand, it segregated the Church Catholic too sharply from the common moral life of humanity. It placed the Episcopal Church in a false attitude towards its contemporaries. It produced a timid, ecclesiastical temper. It tempted men to say, "Master, we saw one casting out devils, and we forbade him because he followeth not with us." A century earlier, in Pennsylvania and Delaware, the Swedish clergy entered the Church without question asked on either side. While the Tractarians were students of divinity, the High Churchman Bishop Ravenscroft of North Carolina did not hesitate to join with the Moravian Bishop Benade in the Holy Eucharist.¹ Without any change of law, this hospitable attitude was lost. The loss was great to all concerned.

Meanwhile the Church proceeded on her way sadly distracted with the strife of tongues.

¹ Norton: Life of Bishop Ravenscroft, p. 126.

Good and evil of the movement.

CHAPTER X.

A PLACE WHERE TWO WAYS MEET.

WHEN the catholic nature of the Church came to be more clearly seen, it became evident that the Protestant Episcopal Church did not adequately represent the ideal. The isolation in the Christian world, which had been its fortune for three hundred years, had affected it in mind and structure. It was organized and equipped as a sect, and to do a sect's work. Its awakened sense of catholicity required a broader outlook. It must establish relations with society. Noblesse oblige. But the common people of America were indifferent or antipathetic. The same movement which had brought the Church to a better understanding of herself had operated to turn the people from her. The ratio of growth was steadily declining.¹ The population was advancing with gigantic strides. The Church crept Falling behind the population.

tardily after. The people neither understood nor cared for her. The more her children loved and believed in her, the more they grieved. The people would not weep to her mourning or dance to her piping. The fault could not be lack of zeal, for no class of men could be found more earnest or tireless than her ministers. Twenty years before, the Church had formally declared that all her children were missionaries by virtue of their baptism. It had undertaken in its organized capacity to win the nation. Who could be more zealous than Polk, more faithful than Whittingham, more apostolic than Kemper, more saintly than Otey, or wiser than De Lancey? But still the Church's growth was not commensurate either with her own character or with the energy expended. The controversialists on either hand were not seriously disturbed. Their thoughts were engrossed. But a class of men, inspired with a deep feeling of the Church's real work in the nation, pondered the matter deeply. Two men — the greatest the American Church has yet produced — saw the situation more clearly than their fellows. Dr. Muhlenberg perceived it as a seer; Bishop Alonzo Potter saw it as a statesman. The Church's theory was catholic; her methods were denominational. The head and the hands were not in harmony, and the heart was torn between them. Wise men had discovered the evil and tried to find a cure. The New York Review (1837-1842) had tried to bring the Church into touch with the thought of the time. Dr. Muhlenberg, in the Evangelical Catholic, had set out her place in Christian society with a wealth of thought and charm of spirit never since equalled. His voice had not been noticed in the din of controversy, but he had spoken the thought of the best and wisest men in the Church.

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 382.

WM. AUGUSTUS MÜHLENBERG

When the General Convention met in 1853, the following Memorial was laid before the House of Bishops: —

RIGHT REVEREND FATHERS:—The undersigned, presbyters of the Church of which you have the oversight,
 The Memorial. venture to approach your venerable body with a sentiment which their estimate of your office in relation to the times does not permit them to withhold. In so doing they have confidence in your readiness to appreciate their motives and their aims.

The actual posture of our Church, with reference to the great moral and social necessities of the day, presents to the minds of the undersigned a subject of grave and anxious thought. Did they suppose that this was confined to themselves they would not feel warranted in submitting it to your attention; but they believe it to be participated in by many of their brethren, who may not have seen the expediency of declaring their views, or at least a mature season for such a course.

The divided and distracted state of our American Protestant Christianity; the new and subtle forms of unbelief, adapting themselves with fatal success to the spirit of the age; the consolidated forces of Romanism, bearing with renewed skill and activity against the Protestant faith; and, as more or less the consequence of these, the utter ignorance of the Gospel among so large a portion of the lower classes of our population, making a heathen world in our midst; are among the considerations which induce your memorialists to present the inquiry whether the period has not arrived for the adoption of measures, to meet these exigencies of the times, more comprehensive than any yet provided for by our present ecclesiastical system; In other words, whether the Protestant Episcopal Church, with only her present canonical means and appliances, her fixed and invariable modes of public worship, her traditional customs and usages, is competent to the work of preaching and dispensing the Gospel to all sorts and conditions of men, and so, adequate to do the work of the Lord in this land and in this age? This question, your petitioners for their own part, and in consonance with many thoughtful minds among us, believe must be answered in the negative. Their memorial proceeds on the assumption that our Church, confined to the exercises of her present system, is not sufficient to the great purposes above mentioned; that a wider door must be opened for the admission to the Gospel ministry than that through which her candidates for holy orders are now obliged to enter. Besides such candidates among her own members, it is believed that men can be found among the other bodies of Christians around us, who would gladly receive ordination at your hands, could they obtain it without that entire surrender, which would now be required of them, of all the liberty in public worship to which they have been accustomed; men, who could not bring themselves to conform in all particulars to our prescriptions and customs, but yet sound in the faith, and who, having the gifts of preachers and pastors, would be able ministers of the New Testament. With deference it is asked, ought such an accession to your means in executing your high commission, "Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," be refused, for the sake of conformity in matters recognized in the preface to the Book of Common Prayer as unessentials? Dare we pray the Lord of harvests to send forth laborers into the harvest, while we reject all laborers but those of one peculiar type? The extension of orders to the class of men contemplated (with whatever safeguards, not infringing on evangelical freedom, which your wisdom might deem expedient), appears to your petitioners to be a subject supremely worthy of your deliberations.

In addition to the prospect of the immediate good which would thus be opened, an important step would be taken towards the effecting of a Church unity in the Protestant Christendom of our land. To become a central bond of union among Christians, who, though differing in name, yet hold to the one Faith, the one Lord, the one Baptism; and, who need only such a bond to be drawn together in closer and more primitive fellowship, is here believed to be the peculiar province and high privilege of your venerable body as a college of Catholic and Apostolic Bishops as such.

This leads your petitioners to declare the ultimate design of their memorial; which is to submit the practicability, under your auspices, of some ecclesiastical system, broader and more comprehensive than that which you now administer, surrounding and including the Protestant Episcopal Church as it now is, leaving that church untouched, identical with that church in all its great principles, yet providing for as much freedom in opinion, discipline, and worship, as is compatible with the essential faith and order of the Gospel. To define and act upon such a system, it is believed, must sooner or later be the work of an American Catholic Episcopate.

In justice to themselves, on this occasion, your memorialists beg leave to remark that, although aware that the foregoing views are not confined to their own small number, they have no reason to suppose that any other parties contemplate a public expression of them, like the present. Having therefore undertaken it, they trust that they have not laid themselves open to the charge of unwarrantable intrusion. They find their warrant in the prayer now offered up by all congregations, "that the comfortable Gospel of Christ may be truly preached, truly received, and truly followed in all places, to the breaking down the kingdom of Sin, Satan, and Death." Convinced that, for the attainment of these blessed ends, there must be some greater concert of action among Protestant Christians than any which yet exists, and believing that with you, Right Reverend Fathers, it rests to take the first measures tending thereto, we could do no less than humbly submit this memorial to such consideration as in your wisdom you may see fit to give it.

Assuring you, Right Reverend Fathers, of our dutiful veneration and esteem,

We are, most respectfully,

Your Brethren and Servants in the Gospel of Christ :

W. A. MUHLENBERG,	C. F. CRUSE,
PHILIP BERRY,	EDWIN HARWOOD,
G. T. BEDELL,	HENRY GREGORY,
ALEX. H. VINTON,	M. A. DEWOLFE HOWE,
S. H. TURNER,	S. R. JOHNSON,
C. W. ANDREWS.	F. E. LAWRENCE, and others.

Concurring in the main purport of the memorial, but not able to subscribe to all its details, the following names were subscribed :

JOHN HENRY HOBART,	A. CLEVELAND COXE,
E. Y. HIGBEE,	FRANCIS VINTON,
ISAAC G. HUBBARD,	and others.

What the Memorialists proposed was at once simple and revolutionary. They meant, in good faith, to put the catholic theory of the Church to the experimentum crucis. "The great catholic idea of the Church may be fully developed by more thoroughly adapting it to all the wants of the country and the times.”¹ Their objective point was the emancipation of the Episcopate.²

Emancipation of bishops. Their action had other aims as well, but this was the chief. The Episcopate was the differentiate of the Church in America. In Rome it was in subjection to the Pope. In England it was fettered by the State. Here it was tied by conventional rules, so that it was powerless to act beyond the borders of the Protestant Episcopal sect, and even within them was checked at every turn. Protestants might stretch out their hands for it in vain. It must be refused unless they would consent to take with it all the peculiarities of the sect which possessed it. This, the Memorialists maintained, was uncatholic. They saw, farther, that if the Episcopate should continue to be deprived of its original powers, and reduced to an office of petty routine, it would soon come to be filled by petty men. They believed that to claim for the office a divine grace, and then to bind it into helplessness from fear of the human infirmities of the men who filled it, was but solemn trifling.

In the second place, they asserted that the Liturgy,³ which they themselves delighted in, was a stumbling-block to thousands, who, but for it, would accept the essentials of the Church; that the principle of compulsory uniformity upon which the Church was acting, was not only uncatholic but foolish;

Loosening of rubrics.

¹ Resolution of Rhode Island Diocese, 1856.

² Evangelical Catholic Papers, p. 181.

³ Ib., p. 163, et seq.

that the Prayer-Book was constructed for the use of well-ordered and well-trained parishes, whereas the Church's work would be, for many a day to come, among those whose customs and prejudices rendered it ungrateful to them; that as "good wine needs no bush," the Liturgy might be trusted to make its own way into general use by its own intrinsic excellence.

A third purpose was to restore a disused force by reviving the lower order of the ministry. There were then but thirty-seven deacons in the Church; Revival of the Diaconate. there should, and might readily have been, five thousand. The ministry was practically closed against all applicants save a small class of men, with peculiar qualifications, hard to attain, and not guaranteeing efficiency when attained. The various sections of the broad vineyard demanded laborers of various sorts. The masses of the people could not be touched but by men from among themselves. A deacon's work required character rather than education,¹ and tent-makers might yet work with their own hands, not being chargeable to any man, and still be apostolic. Above all, they lamented that the door was barred against the ministers of the Protestant world. One of these could enter only "by painful steps and slow." While waiting the long period of probation, — a probation not required of a Roman priest of far inferior character, — he became separated from his own people, so that he must come alone and a stranger.

The ultimate object toward which all their aims

¹ Howe: Memoirs of Bishop Alonzo Potter, p. 185.

pointed was the Unity of Protestant Christendom.¹ The Protestant Episcopal Church, standing as the representative of Catholicity in America, had her task assigned by God. She was to keep open communication with the past. She was to be the tertium quid to produce union in the present.

But to do this last she must move freely among the broken mass. This, the Memorialists contended, she could not do under her present self-imposed limitations.

The Memorial was received by the Convention with the consideration which the names of its signers could not but secure. It was referred to a committee composed of Bishops Otey, Doane, Alonzo Potter, Burgess, Williams, and Wainwright.² They were instructed to report to the next Convention. Bishop Alonzo Potter took charge of the measure, became its advocate, counsellor, and historian.³ It at once arrested the attention of the whole Church. For several years little else was thought or spoken of. Especially among the younger clergy and laymen did it commend itself.⁴ Diocesan conventions discussed it, and passed resolutions for or against its proposals.⁵ Church newspapers advocated or denounced it. Sermons, pamphlets, magazine articles, and books were written about it. The committee which had it in charge circulated a list of questions concerning it, to which they solicited replies.

¹ Evangelical Catholic Papers, p. 322.

² Memorial Papers: with an introduction by Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, Philadelphia, 1857, p. 36.

³ Memorial Papers.

⁴ Ib., p. vii.

⁵ Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 60.

These questions show that the members of the committee either but dimly appreciated its import, or else did not care to consider the fundamental problems at issue. They relate for the most part to details of subordinate importance.¹ The replies they received are directed some to one and some to another of the queries, and some to the principles involved.²

Bishop Doane of New Jersey, in his reply, falls foul of Sunday-schools, as being destructive of home training of children, advocates parish schools wherein the youth of the country may be taught in the spirit of the Church; and recommends that schools of theology be multiplied and localized in various sections of the country, so that the ministry may be more in touch with the people whom it is called to serve.

Bishop Potter of Pennsylvania alone goes to the root of the matter. He advises: to leave to each diocese the power to fix the terms of admission to its own ministry, as best knowing its own needs; to receive Protestant ministers whenever they are ready and fit to come, the diocesan authorities passing upon each case as it arises; to exploit the plan of an unlearned diaconate as proposed in 1853, allowing each diocese to receive its own, and not compelling any other diocese to accept them for duty; leave congregations which are ready to receive an episcopally ordained minister to use the Liturgy or not as they see fit,—as Bishop Kemper had so wisely done with the Swedish and Norwegian

¹ Memorial Papers, pp. 37-40.

² The substance of the answers is in all cases condensed from the papers edited and published by Bishop Potter as Memorial Papers.

Lutherans in Wisconsin ; abandon the idea of enforced uniformity in worship, as uncatholic and disastrous wherever it has been attempted.

Bishop Burgess of Maine recommends to revise the Liturgy so as to make it more fit, and, having done so, exact its use ; when it has been used in any case, allow supplementary extemporary prayers.

Bishop Williams of Connecticut advises district visiting ; that missionary priests are indeed needed, but must be chosen according to a universal standard, and sent under diocesan control. As to unlearned deacons, he doubts, but if there should be such, they must withdraw from secular employment. He had “ prepared some further remarks on the general subject of Christian unity, designed to show that restraints, doctrinal and other, under which we are placed, are not mere accidents, and indications of sectarianism, taken up at will, but things rendered necessary by the abnormal condition of Christendom, and forming part and parcel of our true Catholicity,” — but omits them for lack of space.

Bishop Meade of Virginia believes that the services are too long ; that the minister should be allowed to select the psalms ; that there should be liberty to omit the term “ regenerate ” in baptism.

Bishop Polk replies that among the people of the Southwest the Liturgy is a distinct hindrance ; that it is too long, and the rubrics too rigid ; that it should be left more to the discretion of the minister ; that many of his people cannot read at all ; that a learned and an unlearned ministry are both needed.

Bishop Freeman was opposed to the whole agitation ; “ would never consent to touch in the minutest particular the integrity of the Liturgy ; ” would allow no “ relaxation whatever in the conditions of admitting other ministers ; — they do not want to come any way . ”

Bishop Upfold denies the premises ; the Church has, all things considered, grown wonderfully ; would not consent to touch the Liturgy ; would make the terms of admission for other ministers harder than they are .

Bishop Scott denies the premises ; would allow no relaxation even if they were true .

Dr. Bowman thinks the memorialists should be content with the unlearned diaconate .

Dr. Coxe recommends a primer where the Liturgy cannot be used ; and calls attention to the Moravian Church as a factor in the problem of unity .

Dr. Craik thinks that the door towards Protestantism is too wide open already ; better that some within were shut outside .

Dr. Francis Vinton believes that the whole jurisdiction in the province of ordination should be left with the bishop, to whom it inherently belongs ; that the General Convention had acted ultra vires in its legislation upon the matter ; that the bishop should ordain fit men, and then be only too glad to have them serve Presbyterian or other congregations if they had the chance, without any question of the use of the Liturgy .

A Presbyterian divine says the safety of the sects (sic) depends upon the continued rigidity of the Church ; if that should be abandoned, their existence would be endangered .

A Congregational divine indorses the position of the memorialists as being in the general interest of American Christianity.

A Baptist divine asserts that if the Church could but find a way to reach the masses she could effect more than all others.

A German Reformed divine states that they also are preparing a Liturgy, and would gladly draw nearer to the Church.

A Methodist divine answers that the Church possesses those things which are abiding, and the Methodists those which are discretionary; that each might help the other.

The Committee, having thus gathered opinions from those whom they thought best qualified to speak, and having listened to the discussion which for three years had filled the air, reported to the General Convention of 1856, that the statements of the Memorialists were true; that "the Church is by no means keeping pace with the population;" that the "growth in the last half century furnishes matter of deep humiliation and shame;" that the Liturgy is not suited to all the work required of it; that both dioecesan conventions and representative men agree as to the facts of the case; that there is a wide-spread desire for a more efficient policy.

In the way of cure, they recommend extemporaneous preaching; lay work; sisterhoods; more frequent services; a more hospitable bearing toward other churches; a formal declaration by the House of Bishops that Morning Prayer, Litany, and Holy Communion are distinct services, and need not be said together; a standing committee of five bishops to receive proposals concerning Christian unity; to allow diocesan bishops the power to set forth services for special occasions.

The recommendations were all adopted, — and the situation remained unchanged. The action failed to touch the issue. Dr. Muhlenberg wrote, “It is the genius of Catholicity now knocking at the Church’s doors. Let her refuse to open. Let her, if she will, make them faster still, with new bolts and bars, and then take her rest, to dream a wilder dream than any of the Memorial: of becoming the Catholic Church of these United States.”¹

Twenty years later, Dr. Washburn declared that “had the Memorial prevailed, we should have been spared the two worst misfortunes which have since befallen us. The conscientious men of ritualistic type, instead of defying law for chasubles and candles, would have thrown their devotion into noble work; and the conscientious men who have only added another Reformed Episcopal fragment to the atoms floating in

A fatal choice. Christian space would have remained content with just freedom.”² The Church had the choice set before her to be Catholic or to be sectarian. She chose the latter. She exalted her customs above her principles. The choice threw her back more than a generation.

Men being what they are, no other choice could well have been expected. The Lower House had already begun to think of itself as the Church. It was jealous of Episcopal prerogative, and out of touch with the people. While the Church remained a federation of States neither of these mistakes was possible. Each delegation then instinctively sought to know and do the will of its own people. That allegiance had been insensibly withdrawn from the local church and given to the general body. The people of the dioceses had come to be the constituencies; but the representation had not yet been apportioned to their numbers. The General Convention grew remote. The time came when its deliverances were little heeded. It came to have a life of its own, apart from the common life of the Church. It feared anything which might derange that life. A catholic policy would surely have done so. Party leaders in it feared what might prove to be an opponent's advantage. Men were not willing to intrust others with a liberty which they would have welcomed for themselves. Timidity, mis-called conservatism, shrank from change. As always, men whose vision is acute within a narrow range refused to trust the sight of others who were able to see the end. The Church acquiesced in the decision, as it would have done in its opposite. But the opportunity had been lost. The Church had not been able to see the things which belonged to her peace.

¹ Evangelical Catholic Papers, p. 325.

² Ayres: Life of Dr. Muhlenberg, p. 273.

The canon allowing an unlearned diaconate was passed; but it proved an empty gain.¹ It was an instrument which would not operate in the machinery of which it formed a part. It was discredited from the start. Some bishops would not use it when they could; others could not when they would. Its necessity was presently obscured by the makeshift of "licensed lay readers," — as if any license were needed for a layman to do his ordinary duty.

¹ Howe: Memoirs of Bishop Alonzo Potter, p. 186.

It remained for another generation of men, spiritual sons of the Memorialists, to take up again the work of Liturgical revision and Christian Unity. Dr. Muhlenberg retired to his schools, his hospitals, his free church. Bishop Potter took up again his labor of organizing the religious life, leading the thought, and caring for the poor of his great diocese. Their associates stood in their own lots, exemplifying catholicity in life and work. The Church held on her narrow way. Within the limits she had fixed for herself, her life was active, and, judged by her own standard, successful. The general religious movement of the land went on its course, little affected by her. But she was not unmindful of the spiritual needs of her own children, either in the old States or in the far West.

The same Convention which received the Memorial sent two bishops to the Pacific Coast. California was then four months' journey from New York. Population was pouring into it from all four quarters of the globe. Long lines of "prairie schooners" were winding their tedious way across the plains of Kansas and Nebraska, through the passes of the Rocky Mountains, and down the slopes of the Sierras, carrying the seekers after gold. Another stream was struggling through the swamps and miasmas of "the Isthmus," and still another battling its stormy path

Progress in a narrow path.

“around the Horn,” to the same El Dorado. Its rough, turbulent, picturesque life was at its height. Among the earliest comers were clergy of the Church. Church in California. The Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr was among the “forty-niners.” He gathered a little congregation, and held services in a rude San Francisco shanty. Things moved rapidly there. In 1850 the first “Convention of the Church in California” was held in San Francisco, and six clergy were present. It did not regard itself as a part of the Church in the United States. It was an independent organization, and looked at first to the Greek Church for the Episcopate.¹ It was far nearer, geographically, to the Greek Church in Alaska than to the Protestant Episcopal Church in the States. But when three years more had passed, the swift changes of population which marked the time and place had left the Church almost extinct. Some of the clergy were sick, some dead, some moved away, and some smitten with the “gold fever.” In 1853 the General Convention chose the Rev. Dr. Kip as bishop, and sent him to build the Protestant Episcopal Church in California.

In 1851 the Board of Missions sent the Rev. William Richmond to Oregon. When he arrived, he found St. Church in Oregon. Michael Faekler, a faithful priest from Missouri, living and working in Willamette Valley. In 1853, three clergy and seven laymen met at Oregon City and organized the Church in Oregon. The same year, the General Convention chose the Rev. Dr. Thomas Fielding Scott to be its bishop.

Iowa, Texas, Minnesota, and Arkansas were, a few years later, detached from the great Missionary Jurisdictions, and placed under bishops of their own.

¹ Bishop Kip, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 314.

But the thought and energy of the time were being more and more withdrawn from the affairs of the Church, and absorbed in the condition of the nation. The mutterings of the coming storm of war were already heard. It was possible that the American Church might soon be broken up together with the nation in which it dwelt.

CHAPTER XI.

IN WAR TIME.

THE same institution whose presence in America ultimately caused secession had long before caused ecclesiastical divisions. The "great secession" in 1845 had split the Methodist Church in two. One of its bishops had been found to be "an owner of slaves, by marriage."¹ He was required to purge himself of his fault or lay down his office. The Southern delegates stood by him, and the Methodist Church South was organized.

In 1857 the "New School Presbyterian Church" took similar ground in an expression of opinion upon the Fugitive Slave Law, whereupon several Southern presbyteries withdrew from their connection, and became the nucleus around which the Southern Presbyterian Church was built in 1861.²

Among the Baptists, and all denominations of Congregational type, there had been, of course, no formal separation, for there had never been any organic union, but their formal "fellowship" had long stopped at Mason and Dixon's line.

The Church of Rome had never divided upon the question for quite a different reason. Her unity has nothing to do with the unity of national life, but is centred in a foreign potentate. But all American churches, except the Protestant Episcopal, had ranged themselves toward the same question of negro slavery, which was working to a settlement in the national life.

¹ Stevens: American Methodism, pp. 525-6.

² Schaff-Herzog Encycl., p. 1908.

These foregone ecclesiastical divisions had much to do with making political separation possible.¹ They had familiarized people's minds with the idea. They had withdrawn members of the same spiritual family so far away from each other that mutual understanding became impossible.

In the Episcopal Church this was not the case. Its members North and South were in more friendly relation, and had a better comprehension of each other's thought upon the fundamental question, than had the members of any other organization, religious or secular. The Church had never called slave-holding a sin. It had never made it a matter of discipline. It saw more clearly than did the divided denominations what were the real difficulties involved in its settlement. At the organization of the Church, its members felt about the matter as did the great mass of the Christian people of their time. Slavery was then common to all the colonies. It was accepted as part of the constitution of things. Its practical evils were evident to many, but in itself it was generally accepted to be warranted by Scripture and ancient custom. But a sentiment against it was even then rising. The social and political ills attached to the institution were becoming apparent. There was an

Episcopal Church not divided.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, pp. 492, 494.

instinct that it was antagonistic to the fundamental conception of American political life. This sentiment gained ground slowly, but surely, in the Northern States. As it spread it produced gradual emancipation. But this had taken effect so recently in many Northern States that the old way of regarding slavery, in theory, had not been changed. It had been seen to be practicably undesirable, but not morally indefensible. The great mass of Northern people did not think themselves to be partakers of other men's sins by living in a government which permitted it within its borders. They did not forget that they had lately shared the sin, if it were one. So late as 1850 there were still slaves in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.¹ In 1860 there were still living in the prime of life colored men who had been born bondsmen in the Northern States. But for a generation the relation of the general government toward slavery had been the burning question. It had engaged men's thoughts and emotions far more deeply than any issue that has confronted them, before or since. The Church was blamed for her attitude. Some of her own children thought and spoke of her with shame. They begged her to bear her testimony against this "sum of all villanies;" to break out of this "league with death and covenant with hell."

The Church
blamed.

The great Bishop Wilberforce exclaims with horror that "the Spirit of Missions, edited with the sanction of the Church, and under the eye of the Bishop of New York, proposes to endow a mission school in Louisiana with a plantation to be worked by slaves.”¹ Churchmen offered no protest when the Bishop of Georgia proposed to maintain the “Montpelier Institute” by slave labor, or when the Bishop of South Carolina denounced the “malignant philanthropy of abolition.” With the Abolitionists as a party, the Church had but little sympathy. The intemperance of their denunciations, their incapacity to understand the facts, their close affiliation with infidelity,² all offended her. Church people held rather with President Lincoln. They saw the evils of the institution, and looked for its abolition, but they saw also how closely it was interwoven with the structure of society, and were not ready for heroic surgery.³ The Church preserved the same policy toward slavery that she has always done toward intemperance and poverty. They are evils to be eradicated by strengthening the constitutional life, rather than by the exhibition of specifics.

¹ Williams: History of the Negro Race in America, vol. ii. p. 99.

This history, written by a negro, a member of the Ohio Legislature, is valuable in many regards.

The manner of life in the South was more familiar to her than it was to any other religious body. There had been no separation or cessation of inter-Mutual com- course. Every three years the representa-prehension. tives of all the dioceses sat together for weeks in General Convention. The bishops, North and South, were in constant correspondence, Meade with M’Ilvaine, ¹ Wilberforce: History of the American Church, p. 427.

The writer has but seldom referred to Bishop Wilberforce’s History. It is not of great value. It bears the mark of the haste with which it was prepared, and the scantiness of the authorities at its author’s command. See Life of Bishop Wilberforce, p. 87.

² Caswall: American Church and Union, p. 278.

³ Nicolay and Hay: Life of Abraham Lincoln, in loc.

³ Raymond: Life and State Papers of Abraham Lincoln, p. 759.

Whittingham with Hopkins.¹ The Bishops of Virginia, Ohio, Tennessee, and Louisiana had kept the promise mutually given long before that they would pray for each other by name every Sunday morning.² Each section was fully aware of the others' sentiments. Northern Churchmen had often heard the Bishop of Virginia say, and in general they agreed with him, that slavery was never to his taste; but that he had no conscientious scruples as to its lawfulness.³ They knew that he had, like many others, emancipated slaves himself, only to find the poor creatures helpless vagabonds in the midst of a slave-holding community.⁴ Indeed, manumission of individuals was a very doubtful kindness. When that sturdy Vermonter, Bishop Chase, went to live in New Orleans, he was compelled to purchase his negro Jack, because he could not obtain a servant in any other way. But having ended his residence there, he was at his wit's end to know what to do with Jack.⁵ Northern Churchmen knew that their brethren in the South were not altogether unmindful of the religious welfare of their slaves. They knew that in South Carolina there were a hundred and fifty congregations of negroes for a hundred of whites;⁶ that the Bishop of Virginia had preached his Convention Sermon upon the duty owed by the whites to negroes; that thousands of them were regular and faithful communicants.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 492.

² Ib., p. 237.

³ Ib., p. 476.

⁴ Caswall: American Church and Union, p. 276.

⁵ Chase: Reminiscences, vol. i. p. 75.

⁶ Caswall: p. 273.

All these things did not change their opinion of slavery. It was bad, only bad, and that continually. But this mutual understanding and sympathy kept the Church together while the Union lasted, and brought it together again as soon as that was restored.

In 1860 it became evident that a slave-holding people and a free people would not live in the same house.

Southern bishops oppose secession. But when secession was first proposed it was strenuously resisted by the leading Southern bishops. The Bishop of Virginia used his great influence against it.¹ The Bishop of Maryland was still more outspoken, and remained steadfast to the Union through all.² In its defence he sacrificed the love of lifelong friends, and nearly broke his heart. Otey of Tennessee wrote to Bishop Polk, "It is God alone that can still the madness of the people. To what quarter shall we look when such men as you and Elliott deliberately favor secession? What can we expect, other than violence among the masses, when the fathers of the land openly avow their determination to destroy the work which their fathers established at the expense of their blood?"³

But when secession became a political fact, the Southern Churchmen maintained that it carried with it ecclesiastical separation. They contended that they had no choice. When the States in which they lived went out of the Union, they bore the Church with them as really as a ship bears her company out to sea. To their minds the separation was as complete as though a physical chasm had suddenly yawned between the North and the South.¹ Bishops Polk and Elliott say in a circular letter, "This necessity does not arise out of any division which has occurred within the Church itself, nor from any dissatisfaction with either the doctrine or discipline of the Church. We rejoice to record that we are to-day, as Churchmen, as truly brethren as we have ever been, and that no deed has been done, or word uttered, which leaves a single wound rankling in any breast." The Southern Churchmen had retained the original idea that the general Church was made by a voluntary compact of autonomous State Churches, long after that idea had faded out of mind in the North. Bishop Meade had not taken kindly to the General Missionary Society, and had opposed the General Seminary for this very reason. They seemed to him to be movements toward a centralization which he believed to be contrary both to the spirit and the policy of the Church.² When the States seceded one by one, the Churches within them reverted to their primitive diocesan independence. No violent revolution in their ecclesiastical ideas was needed to bring them into harmony with their new situation. When the States confederated themselves into a new nation, it was the most natural thing for the dioceses to confederate themselves into a new Church.

¹ Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, p. 492. "You see that I am almost in despair. I am told that our clergy in Charleston preach in favor of disunion. I fear some of our bishops consent, or why have I heard of no remonstrance?"

² Brand: Life of Bishop Whittingham, vol. ii. pp. 11, 20.

³ Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 90.

Southern idea of the Church and the States.

¹ Wilmer: The Recent Past, p. 226.

"As if an abyss had suddenly yawned between the two sections."

² Johns: Life of Bishop Meade, pp. 109, 504.

All their previous habits of thought made the way easy for them.¹

When the General Convention met in New York in 1862, the chasm had opened between the two sections, and war was already raging. The Southern dioceses were absent. What should the Church do in this new exigency?

Once, long before, the delegates from a geographical section had been absent. A belt of yellow fever had cut off New England from the other States. At that time, the Church had accepted the physical explanation, and proceeded without the absent brethren. The same thing was done now. The Convention tacitly adopted the same theory which had controlled the action of the Southern dioceses. There was a physical obstacle in the way of their coming. But every day the roll of all the States was called.² The delegates might come and take their seats if they would or could. The possibility of any diocese being voluntarily absent was ignored. By the next triennial Convention they had returned. The General Convention continued to act as the representative of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. The Nation did not acknowledge that any States had gone; no more did the Church.

But it was confronted with the question of what was its duty to the Nation in this its hour of need. The deliverance of a body so influential as the Episcopal Church would carry weight, and was anxiously looked for. It was given without hesitation in favor of the Union. A committee

The Church
and the Union.

¹ Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 121.

² General Convention Journal, 1862.

of nine was appointed to prepare a fitting declaration.¹ When reported and adopted, after long and earnest discussion, it set forth: That obedience to civil authority is a Christian's duty and a Churchman's habit; that while the Convention had no hard words for its brethren in the South, it could not be blind to the fact that they were "in open and armed resistance to regularly constituted government;" that as individual citizens the members of the Convention will not be found wanting in word or deed to aid the country in its struggle; that as the council of a Church which hath ever renounced all political action, they can only pray that the National Government may be successful in this its rightful endeavor.

A lay deputy from Maryland opposed the action, on the ground that a Church council may not concern itself in any way with political questions. The Presiding Bishop, Hopkins of Vermont, took the same position, and refused to read the Pastoral Letter which expressed the same general sentiment of patriotism.² These objections were brushed aside. The issue was felt to be moral rather than political. Ecclesiastical precisians could not be heard upon it. The whole weight of the Church's influence, which was not small, was given to the Union side throughout the struggle. In the very darkest hour, when it became almost a matter of life or death to change the drift of English sympathy from the Southern to the Northern side, Bishop M'Ilvaine was one of the ambassadors at large to the English people, chosen and informally accredited by President Lincoln. Together with Thurlow Weed, Henry Ward Beecher, and Archbishop Hughes, he went to England. He had entertained the Prince of Wales while visiting this country, and was well known among that class who most needed to be set right upon the true nature of the conflict. Few men effected more for the Union cause than did the Bishop of Ohio by this embassy.¹

¹ General Convention Journal, 1862.

² Brand: Life of Bishop Whittingham, vol. ii. p. 32.

Meanwhile the absent dioceses had organized the Church in the Confederate States.² Its leaders were Polk, the Bishop of Louisiana, and Elliott, the Bishop of Georgia. The Bishop of Virginia was with them now in sympathy, but he was old and near to die. In March of 1861 Polk and Elliott met at Sewanee, Tenn., on business connected with the University of the South. By that time South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas had seceded. The Church in each was an ecclesiastical fragment, floating in space. They were only more fortunate than the colonists had been at the close of the Revolution, in that they had diocesan organizations and bishops. Some one must volunteer to lead them if they were to confederate. Polk and Elliott took up the task. They addressed a circular letter, asking each seceded diocese to send delegates to a conference to be held at Montgomery, Ala., in July. In response to their call thirty delegates came. Four bishops were present, Elliott of Georgia, Green of

The Church
in the Confederacy.

¹ Dyer: Records of an Active Life, p. 280.

² The material for this sketch of the Church in the Confederate States is chiefly taken from a monograph of that title by the Rev. Dr. John Fulton in Perry's History of the American Church, vol. ii. pp. 561-592.

Mississippi, Rutledge of Florida, and Davis of South Carolina. Cobbs of Alabama had just died; Otey of Tennessee was ill; Meade of Virginia was old and infirm; Atkinson of North Carolina did not respond; Gregg of Texas was cut off by the blockade; Polk had entered the Confederate Army. Six dioceses were represented by clergy or laymen. All three orders sat in one House. There were no rules, in the nature of the case. The Convention was not a Church, but the material out of which one might be framed. They agreed that it was "necessary and expedient" that the dioceses of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the seceded States should form among themselves an independent organization. It was urged that the eyes of the Confederacy were upon them, and that they owed the new government the moral support which they could give it by acting as if they expected it to be abiding. An ecclesiastical reason also pressed. Alabama was without a bishop. If it should elect a man to that office, as was likely, who would take order for his consecration? The situation was difficult. The Convention was not large enough or representative enough to go forward to a complete organization; it was too large and too conspicuous to go back and leave nothing done. They therefore took a recess until the following October, appointing a committee, of three of each order, to prepare a constitution and canons meanwhile. When October came, all the States in the Confederacy were represented save Texas, and all the bishops present except General Polk. Then they went forward and adopted the constitution and canons, substantially the same as those they had been familiar with in the general Church, thus perfecting the Church in the Confederacy. The name of "Reformed Catholic" was proposed for the new organization, but failed of adoption. Following the guidance of existing facts, as the Conference in Maryland had done eighty years before, they called it the "Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States of America." The Prayer-Book was changed by substituting Confederate States for United States throughout.¹ Arkansas, then a Missionary Jurisdiction of the old Church, was admitted as a diocese in the new one. Shortly afterward Alabama elected Dr. R. H. Wilmer to be its bishop. This compelled the new Church to discharge the functions of a General Council. The consent of the several standing committees was secured, and the senior bishop in the Confederacy took order for his consecration. In all respects the new organization proceeded to act as a national Church.

But in the daily life of its members it encountered grave difficulties. Apart from the hardships and privations which arose from their territory being the seat of war, their liturgical worship brought them constantly into conflict with the Federal military authorities. Their Liturgy put into their mouths words of prayer for the Confederacy instead of for the United States and its President. Its Confederate Church and Federal authorities. ¹ Dr. Fulton calls attention to the curious fact that in the only edition of this Prayer-Book ever published (by Eyre and Spottiswoode, London), the words United States remained by an oversight in the Forms of Prayer to be Used at Sea. So that aboard the "Alabama" (if the company prayed at all) they must pray, "That we may be a safeguard to the United States of America, and a security for such as pass on the seas on their lawful occasions"!

use put them at a disadvantage as compared with the other Christian people in the Confederacy. The Romish Liturgy, being in a language not understood of the people, and recognizing no ruler but the Pope, could be used in the United States or in the Confederacy or in the planet Jupiter with equal fitness. Non-Liturgical clergymen could avoid words of constructive treason by any periphrases they chose. If their petitions were only intelligible by God, they need not offend any earthly authority. But Churchmen were in an evil case. If they held public worship at all, they must offend. To use the prayers for the rulers or to omit them was equally dangerous. In 1862 General Butler issued an order that "the omission, in the service of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New Orleans, of the Prayers for the President of the United States, would be regarded as evidence of hostility to the Government of the United States." In a lengthy correspondence which ensued, the general undertook to show the clergy what the Canon Law required in the premises. His canonical knowledge was equal to his military skill. But the discussion was terminated by the forcible closure of the churches. The rectors were arrested and sent North as military prisoners, but upon their arrival at New York were at once set at liberty. Similar conflicts were constantly occurring as the Federal forces gained control of more and more territory. Dr. Wingfield of Portsmouth, Va., was condemned to the chain-gang for a similar offence. Dr. Smith of Alexandria was arrested in his chancel for refusing to use the Prayer for the President of the General

Butler as a Canonist.

United States at the command of a military officer who was present.¹ General Woods inhibited the Bishop and all the clergy of Alabama. For a time, the churches in that State were closed, and armed guards stationed at the doors to keep them from being opened.² The Bishop was followed to his retreat by an officer instructed to see that he should pray for the President of the United States. One of his clergy consented to use the prayer for the President, but "under protest!"³ A letter from the Bishop to President Lincoln produced an immediate revocation of the obnoxious order. Such instances might be multiplied indefinitely. The Church in the South had set itself in antagonism to the United States by the very fact of its existence. Its raison d'être was the assumption that certain States had actually withdrawn from the Union. From the Northern point of view, they not only had not gone out, but by attempting to do so they had committed a flagrant offence. The Church became particeps criminis in the offence. Its Liturgy made it impossible for it to evade the consequences of its original act of organization. The only final justification of revolution is success. In this case success was wanting. In its absence, all concerned in the attempt bore their share of the awful cost of failure. None bore it with a better grace or a more patient dignity than the short-lived Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States.

Fall of the Confederate
Church.

¹ Slaughter: Memorial of the Rev. George Archibald Smith, p. 41.

² Wilmer: The Recent Past, p. 146.

³ The Bishop, very properly, wonders what would be the precise effect of such a prayer?

CHAPTER XII.

THE REUNITED CHURCH.

IN the spring of 1865 the Confederacy ceased to be. With its dissolution the reason for the Southern Church passed away. Their contention from the first had been that, being cut off from the United States by no act of their own, the dioceses in the seceded States simply conformed to existing facts in organizing a new church. Now, on their own principles, their Church's place was gone. Their Prayer-Book was obsolete. There was no longer any "President of the Confederate States" to pray for if they had wished it. But it was not so clear that they had been borne back involuntarily into the Protestant Episcopal Church by the reflux of the tide. They might not be willing to resume their long vacant places; the Church might not be willing to receive them. They had gone out because a political chasm separated the two sections. That gulf was now closed, but not until it had been filled with human blood. Fortunately old friendships still held. The Presiding Bishop, Hopkins of Vermont, and Bishop Elliott of Georgia, the leader in the Southern Church, were more than brethren. Their old affection for each other was unbroken. Elliott clearly discerned the situation. "We appealed," he said, "to the God of battles, and He has given His

Moving toward reunion.

decision against us. We accept the result as the work, not of man, but of God.”¹ In this temper he was ready to work for peace and unity. But all were not of his mind. Chagrin, humiliation, apprehension, and anger were common among his people. The unhappy “reconstruction” period had set in. Military governors were still in occupation of the late seceded States. Bishop Hopkins, with the knowledge and consent of his brethren, sent a circular letter to all the Southern Bishops, assuring them of a welcome if they would take their places in the approaching General Convention in October. Bishop Wilmer of Alabama expressed the sentiment both of his own State and Mississippi² when he replied that it was by no means clear as yet that the Southern dioceses might not retain their separate position; that would depend upon circumstances not yet determined;³ that they could not come back as supplicants for pardon; that human passions were facts which must be taken account of; that the best men in the South were yet under the ban as traitors; that their representative man might yet be hanged; that all would depend upon the spirit shown by the General Convention itself when it should meet; that they could abide the result of the war, but could not yet join in Te Deums over their own defeat.

Apart from the sore temper on the one hand, and the triumphant one on the other, there were grave difficulties to be adjusted. The Bishop of Alabama had been elected and consecrated outside of the Church's rules. Arkansas had been taken from the missionary jurisdiction of the Southwest, and erected into a diocese. Worst of all, Bishop Polk of Louisiana had broken Catholic rule and violated Christian sentiment by taking arms. But his name was dear in the South. A graduate of West Point, he had been almost forced into command at a time when competent leaders were hard to find. He had assumed the duty most reluctantly.¹ But he was urged on every hand. Even the old Bishop of Virginia had called to his mind, when he hesitated, that "the conduct of Phineas was so praiseworthy that the inspired David says it was accounted to him for righteousness through all posterities for evermore; and did not Samuel, the minister of God from his infancy, lead forth the hosts of Israel to battle, and with his own hand slay the king of Amalek?"² He had taken up the sword against his will, and sought in vain to be allowed to lay it down.³ At Pine Mountain he had fallen, and his blood had discolored the Prayer-Book in his pocket, and half washed out of it the names, written by his own hand, of his three friends, Johnson, Hood, and Hardee.⁴ Any suggestion of censure upon the conduct of the dead could not be borne.

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 339.

² Wilmer: The Recent Past, p. 166.

³ Ib., p. 155.

All these things made the Southern people hesitate. They needed not to have done so. When the General Convention met at Philadelphia in October, 1865, the

¹ Fulton, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 581.

² Green: Life of Bishop Otey, p. 96.

³ Ib., p. 100.

⁴ Fulton, in Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 583.

clerk of the House of Deputies began with "Alabama" in calling the roll of dioceses. The roll had never been changed. Alabama and the other Confederate States had only been absent from one meeting, and their names had never been removed. To the general gratification of all, two Southern bishops, Atkinson of North Carolina, and Lay of Arkansas, were present at the opening service. They came, doubting both their right and their welcome.¹ They were hospitably entreated and constrained to take their places. The Convention acted on the dreaded questions with good-sense and generosity. It was resolved that the Bishop of Alabama should be received upon signing the ordinary declaration of conformity.² No question was raised about the regularity of his consecration. The case of Arkansas had settled itself. Its short life as a diocese had been destroyed by the ravages of war. The Church within it was practically extinct. Bishop Lay had been all the while, in spite of himself, the missionary bishop of the Southwest. In that capacity his place was still open. The career of Bishop Polk was not referred to. He was dead. But the harmony came near being destroyed by an unexpected means. The House of Bishops proposed a thanksgiving service for "the restoration of peace and the re-establishment of the National Government over the whole land." The Bishop of North Carolina protested that his people could not say that. They acquiesced in the result of the war, and

General Convention of 1865.

Reunion
imperilled.

¹ Harrison: Life of Bishop Kerfoot, vol. ii. p. 391.

² General Convention Journal, 1865.

would accommodate themselves to it like good citizens; but they were not thankful. They had prayed that the issue might have been different. They were ready to "return thanks for peace to the country, and unity to the Church;" but that was a different matter. Bishop Stevens of Pennsylvania moved to substitute the Southern man's words for the ones in the resolution offered. His motion was carried by sixteen to seven.¹ When the amended resolution was offered in the House of Deputies, Horace Binney of Pennsylvania moved to restore the original phrase giving thanks Horace Binney's resolution. "for the re-establishment of the National Government over the whole land," and to add to it "and for the removal of the great occasion of national dissension and estrangement to which our late troubles were due" (referring to slavery).² A storm of discussion at once arose, both within and without the Convention. The secular press of the country took up the matter; declared that the loyalty of the Church itself was upon trial; that it dare not refuse to pass Mr. Binney's patriotic resolution; that too much tenderness had already been shown to "unreconstructed rebels." Dr. Kerfoot, President of Trinity College, came to the rescue.³ He had been, all through the war, a Union man in a place where his loyalty had cost him something. His college in Maryland had been well-nigh destroyed. He had tended the wounded at Antietam and South Mountain, battles fought at his very door. He had been seized a prisoner by General Early's order. His goods had been destroyed by the Confederate soldiery. He, if any one, had the right to speak. His own loyalty was beyond all question. He begged the Convention to remember that it had itself invited and urged the Southern delegates to come; that the place to celebrate the triumph of the Northern arms was outside of the Church; that not only the present but the future peace of the Church was at stake; that if the Church should be led by its passions now, future unity would be impossible; that "their thanksgiving for unity and peace should ascend to the throne of God in such a form that all could honestly join in it."

¹ Perry: History, vol. ii. p. 592.

² General Convention Journal, 1865.

³ Harrison: Life of Bishop Kerfoot, vol. ii. p. 393, et seq.

His wise and earnest argument prevailed. By a vote of twenty dioceses to six, Mr. Binney's amendment was defeated,¹ and the House of Bishops' more generous terms were carried. This action settled the question of reunion. The Southern Church met once more at Augusta, closed out its affairs decently, and was no more.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in its integrity entered upon its modern life in an undivided nation. The generation now living had come upon the stage. But the war had done far more than to settle a political dispute. It had profoundly changed the conditions of American life. It introduced four millions of manumitted slaves to a new social, political, religious existence. The old methods of the Church for them were no longer applicable. The awful problem pressed to find new and efficient ones. The war had done much to break up sectarian isolation. When young men who had been taught in their country homes that Romanism was pure abomination, had been gently nursed by Sisters of Charity in the military hospital, their prejudices were greatly shaken. When Churchmen had their wounds bound up and heard extemporaneous prayers offered at their side by Methodist and Presbyterian chaplains and Christian Commission agents, they changed their thought about the validity of a ministry which bore such fruits. When these in turn heard Churchmen openly recite the Creed and say their prayers, they were arrested and impressed. The end of the war was followed by a period of restless moving to and fro. Soldiers had learned to travel. They brought back with them to their quiet homes a broader habit of mind and a quickened consciousness of national life. They brought a wider thought to the congregations where they worshipped. A ferment was working in every province of life. It could be seen in commerce, art, and social habit. Religion felt it also.

¹ General Convention Journal, 1865.

² Brand: Life of Bishop Whittingham, vol. ii. p. 74.

The Church was in the presence of a new set of facts and forces. To understand them would require of her judgment and a sound mind, the spirit of wisdom and ghostly strength. The Doctrine of Evolution, just coming into notice, was to change her whole way of regarding life and man. The teaching of Robertson, Maurice, and the author of "Ecce Homo," with the new method in History and Criticism, was to become a solvent of many of her accepted dogmas. The revived movement of population westward was to tax her missionary spirit to its utmost. Her great work among the Indians in the Northwest, already begun, was to be carried to completion. She was to plant a church in Hayti, and to aid and foster one in Mexico. The wisdom and energy needed to adjust herself to the changed conditions of life was to be drawn off for a period into the long, dreary, barren contest over Ritual. The amazing spectacle of grave and learned theologians and jurists endeavoring to perform modistes' and dancing masters'¹ work was to be displayed before the astonished eyes of an earnest generation which had just fought a mighty war over questions of the first rank. Bishop Cummins and his following of restless spirits were to add a superfluous sect to the divisions of Christendom. The Church Congress was to give outlet to surcharged thought, and to bring men to a better knowledge of each other's spirit. The "Church Idea" was to be infused into American Protestantism. The task of the memorialists was to be taken up again, and the Liturgy revised to fit the exigencies of common life. The idea of a mechanical uniformity was to be unconsciously forsaken. The Episcopate was to break from its trammels, and proclaim to the divided Christian world the Church's hope and plan for Unity.

Religious effects of the war.

New forces and new problems.

¹ A committee of five bishops, among the greatest in learning and character, deliberated and reported concerning the washing of the priest's hands, bowings, genuflections, reverences, bowing down upon or kissing the holy table; a surplice reaching to the ankles for choristers; a surplice not reaching below the ankle for priests; stoles, bands, black gowns, and university caps. General Convention Journal, 1871.

CHAPTER XIII.

DOCTRINE AND CEREMONIAL.

WHILE statesmen and politicians were busy over the problem of "Reconstruction," ecclesiastics and Church conventions were busy with the "Ritual Controversy." This term, which we use as convenient because it has been so generally applied to the question at issue, is, indeed, misleading. It is inconceivable that devout and earnest Christians and Churchmen should have thought worth while to argue, denounce, struggle, manoeuvre, and pray for or against a little more or less of elaborate form in the conduct of the public worship of God. The contestants on both sides were always careful to declare that they regarded "Ritual," in itself considered, as of very subordinate moment. What, then, was at issue? What saved a controversy which was waged so furiously for a decade, and which divides men's opinions to-day, from being laughed off the stage? Men do not long continue to be interested in paltry things. Should the Christian Minister be called a priest or a presbyter? Should the Holy Table be called a table or an altar? Should the officiating Minister wear a surplice or a black gown? Should candles be permitted to burn by daylight on or about the altar? Should flowers be allowed in the chancel or about the font? Should anthems be sung or said? These things, in themselves, are allowed to be of no more consequence than the color of a cockade. But, then, the color of a cockade has more than once in the world's history sufficed to inflame a nation. The rival hues of the red and the white rose have served to keep a kingdom at war for generations. What was at issue in the Ritual Controversy? At bottom it was a local phase of that division which is as old as the history of Religion between the Prophet and the Priest. The Sons of Levi and the Sons of the Prophets have ever had a different thought concerning God's ways with men. Only under the pressure of a common peril from the outside do Iddo the Seer and Jeshua the son of Johzadek work together for the building of God's house. For more than two centuries the Protestant doctrine of "Justification by Faith alone" had remained unchallenged in the Church of England. Even the Non-jurors, and the American Churchman of the Seabury and Hobart type, had affirmed it as strenuously as had the Evangelicals. Their reverence for the Sacraments and for the Church's ways was due rather to their love of order and prescription than to any belief that salvation was attained through sacrosanct observances.

The worth of ritual.

But a generation had now grown up within the influence of the Catholic Revival. The very essence of the Oxford Movement was that it claimed for the Church as a divine institution a necessary place and function in the salvation of the individual. The Church, it asserted, is not a society into which men come after they have become Christians, and in which they remain because they are Christians, but is the divinely ordained instrument by which men are made Christians, and its sacraments and ordinances are the means by which their spiritual life is kept from perishing. To those thus persuaded everything connected with the Church takes on a new value and significance. It is not enough for them that public service shall be conducted decently and with decorum. The high and dry propriety in a Connecticut parish church was little less offensive than the pietistic freedom of an Ohio prayer meeting. What they desired was that in everything connected with the Church its supernatural quality should be manifest. The peculiarity of architecture, the bearing of the worshippers, the dress of the officiant, the arrangement of furniture, lights, flowers, incense, music, gesture, tone, all these should conform to and show forth the central thought of the Church as the peculiar dwelling place of God on earth. Ritual was the attempt to express this. Few were clear-sighted enough to discern precisely what was desired or what was threatened, but still fewer were uninfluenced by the movement going forward.

The movement also fell in and marched with a far wider change which had begun to show itself in every department of life among the people. During the Civil War more than three millions of men had learned to wear uniform and to keep step. Civil and military display had grown familiar. Insignia of rank, badges of office, rhythm of procession, flags and banners as symbols of organization, things from which the republican prejudice of ante bellum days had turned away, had now come in. Civil and military ritual are closely related to ecclesiastic. Agitation for cap and gown set in in colleges and universities. Uniforms began to be worn in boys' schools, and by the employees of railways and steamboats, and, a little later on, by the employees of great private firms. A suggestion of similar customs twenty years earlier would have been met with ridicule or indignation. The fact was that the whole nation was growing ritualistic. It was too much to expect, even if one wished it, that the Church should remain uninfluenced.

Civic ritual. But the movement within the Church was opposed with a bitterness and intensity of zeal which it is, happily, difficult to realize now. Evangelicals opposed it because it sprang from a conception of the Church and a rationale of Sacraments which was, to their minds, radically false and practically perilous. High Anglicans withstood it because it disturbed the conventional order of the Ecclesiastical household. Conservative Churchmen withstood it because it introduced novelties, and to not a few minds novel truth is no less obnoxious than novel error. Romanists flouted it as a clumsy aping of manners which were to them, being to the manner born, fit and reasonable. Protestants pointed to it with a real or affected horror, and saw in it Episcopacy marching to its logical end. Wits jested at it; theologians argued against it; canonists thundered at it; bishops charged anent it; foolish priests made it ridiculous by their extravagances; and, meanwhile, ritualism steadily advanced.¹ No environment was safe. It spread in New York; it invaded Pennsylvania; it appeared in Vermont; it broke out sporadically in Ohio; even the dry air of Connecticut was not fatal to it. No controversy in the whole history of the American Church has caused such an intensity of feeling. For a time it seemed as if no refuge could be found anywhere from the strife of tongues. Brotherly kindness and even Christian Charity seemed to have disappeared. There is little to choose between the methods and temper of its advocates and opponents. The former were filled with the new wine of revived ecclesiasticism, and the latter were alarmed at the breaking up of old customs and dismayed at the presence, in the air, of a spirit which they did not comprehend.

¹ Church Journal, 1867, p. 140.

The contention of the so-called ritualists was, from the first, that they were acting within the law of the Church when introducing those acts and methods which were denounced as innovations. Such a contention appeared simply preposterous to old-fashioned Churchmen. When the ritualist went farther and accused them of being themselves habitual law-breakers, they honestly thought that midsummer madness could go no farther. There were two questions concerning acts of ritual: Were they in themselves fitting and desirable? Were they permissible by the law of the Church? The ritualists labored to prove the first; their opponents labored to disprove the second. At first it seemed hardly worth while to disprove it. Could any sane man believe that these things were legal in the American Church—lights on the altar, alb, chasuble, dalmatic, and such like, and of variegated colors; bowings and crossings, the burning of incense, the chrism in Confirmation, the mixed chalice and wafer bread? In 1866 the venerable Dr. Hopkins, Bishop of Vermont, and Presiding Bishop, was moved to take up his parable concerning the matter. In October of that year he issued his book, "The Law of Ritual," which in three months ran through three editions. Bishop Hopkins's book. Bishop Hopkins was a lawyer and a theologian, a man of unquestioned candor and courage, and of exceptional personal character. That he was something of a doctrinaire was rather an advantage than otherwise in enabling him to pass judgment on a burning question in a time of excitement.

The ritualists' contention.

JOHN HENRY HOPKINS
First Bishop of Vermont

The effect of his book upon the Church at large was much that of Balaam's prophesying upon the Moabites. "For Balak said unto Balaam, What hast thou done unto me? I took thee to curse mine enemies, and behold thou hast blessed them altogether." He had conceded the whole case. The law of the Church being what it was—that is, the Canon Law of the Church of England, except upon such points as that law had been specifically set aside or modified—all the disputed points were lawful.

If the situation were as the presiding bishop declared it to be, the opponents of ritualism were left but two things to do.¹ They might either organize the public opinion of the Church so strongly against the incoming movement as to stop it and turn it back; or they might have the law of the Church so changed as to put an end to it by penalties. They essayed to do both in turn.

¹ "The appearance of the Bishop of Vermont's little book is a serious thing, as it opens the door for experiments which are not unlikely to be made in respectable churches, if not in some of the most important seats of the Church's dignity and strength!"—Letter to a Bishop, Arthur Cleveland Coxe, 1866.

In October, 1866, the House of Bishops met in New York for certain special business. The question of Ritualism was discussed at length, and a Committee was appointed to propose a Declaration upon the subject. The moving spirit, and the Secretary of the Committee, was the Bishop of Western New York. It seems to have been hoped by the Bishops that a formal expression of opinion by them could be weighty enough to stop a movement which they disapproved, but which each in his own diocese was not bold enough to confront officially. This hope, to which that House has fondly clung at many junctures, failed here as always. Their hesitation betrayed itself in the very tenor of The Bishops' Declaration. In its preamble they disavowed official character for their action. "Whereas, at a meeting of the House of Bishops held in the month of October the subject of ritualism was brought to the notice of the House and considered with great unanimity, and

Whereas, on account of the absence of a number of the Right Rev. members of the House, and the fact that the House was not sitting as a coördinate branch of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, it was regarded as inexpedient to proceed to any formal action, and

Whereas, it was nevertheless regarded as highly desirable that an expression of opinion on the part of the Episcopate of this Church should be given in respect to ritualistic innovations; Therefore the undersigned Bishops, reserving each for himself his right as Ordinary of his own Diocese . . . do unite in the following Declaration.”¹

The Declaration, which is lengthy, consists of an argument, a conclusion, and an instance. The argument is that every national Church has the power to decree finally, and without reference to any other national Church, everything which pertains to its own Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship; that this Church has done so, with the result that the ceremonies, rites, and worship thus established, ordained, and set forth in the Book of Common Prayer are the sole law of this Church. The conclusion, rather hinted at than expressed, is that no rite, fashion, ceremony, or position not specifically commanded by rubric is lawful. The instances noted of such illegal innovations are: “The use of incense, and the burning of lights in the order of the Holy Communion; reverences to the Holy Table or to the Elements placed thereon; the adoption of clerical habits hitherto unknown.” Finally, as a tub to a whale, was appended the notification that, “we include in these censures all departures from the laws, rubrics and settled order of the Church by defect as well as by excess of observance.' It was presently seen that the Declaration was but a brutum fulmen. Its premises were not historically defensible; its conclusion was inconsequential; its instances were badly chosen. In any case the people against whom it was addressed were neither in the mood nor of the temper to be influenced by the unsolicited advice of a score of individual Bishops, some of whom they regarded as indocti, some as time-serving, and some as malignant. If Ritualism could be stayed it could only be by express statute in that case made and provided. Advice, counsel, remonstrance were of no avail. Still less where it was evident to all that the counsellors were almost without exception men who had themselves been carried more or less from their old positions, and, having fetched up at various points of advance, demanded that every one else should stand at the precise point where he had come to rest.

¹ The signers were Smith of Kentucky, McIlvaine and Bedell of Ohio, Kemper of Wisconsin, McCoskrey of Michigan, Lee of Delaware, Johns of Virginia, Eastburn of Massachusetts, Chase of New Hampshire, Upfold of Indiana, Payne of Africa, Williams of Connecticut, Davis of South Carolina, Kip of California, Lee of Iowa, Clark of Rhode Island, Whipple of Minnesota, Talbot of Indiana, Wilmer of Alabama, Vail of Kansas, Coxe of Western New York, Clarkson of Nebraska, Randall of Colorado, Kerfoot of Pittsburg, Williams of China, Cumins of Kentucky, Armitage of Wisconsin.

In the General Convention of 1868 a Committee of five Bishops¹ was appointed to consider and report to the next Convention "Whether any additional provision for Uniformity by canon or otherwise is practicable and expedient." When the next General Convention met in Baltimore in 1871, this committee reported to the House of Bishops that in their judgment such legislation was not only practicable and expedient, but was imperatively and immediately necessary. "Unless something is done, and done soon, in the interest of uniformity the diversities of use now obtaining bid fair to equal if they do not exceed those which at the period of the Anglican Reformation were regarded as an evil to be removed. They occasion confusion, trouble and perplexity, among our people, and these evils must increase as their causes are multiplied.”

¹ Bishops Lee of Delaware, Williams, Clark, OJenheimer, Kerfoot.

They recommend, therefore,¹ that the following things shall be expressly prohibited by canon: the use of incense; a crucifix in any part of the Church; carrying a cross in procession in the Church; the use of ornamental lights on the altar; the elevation of the elements in the Holy Communion; the mixed chalice; ablutions of the priest's hands or of the vessels in the presence of the congregation; bowings, crossings, genuflections, reverences; bowing down before or kissing the Holy Table; celebration of the Holy Communion by bishop or priest alone; choral service without the consent of the vestry or contrary to the prohibition of the Bishop; the wearing of a surplice which does not reach down to the ankles by any chorister. They recommend, farther, that canonical provision be made touching the dress of ministers officiating in the congregation, to the effect that the only lawful, official dress shall be, for the bishop, the present episcopal robes, for all ministers a white surplice, a black or white stole, a black cassock not reaching below the ankles, a black gown, and bands, and that when expediency or health demands it, the university cap may be used. When the report was presented the House of Bishops resolved that, “in view of the gravity of the subject," they were not prepared to act upon it without it being first considered by a joint Committee of the two houses, and asked that a Committee of the House of Deputies should be appointed by ballot for that purpose.¹ The Joint Committee thus asked for was created, with Bishop Whittingham of Maryland at the head of the Bishops, and Dr. Mead of Connecticut at the head of the Deputies. During a debate which extended over two weeks the specific list of "innovations" which the Committee of Bishops had advised to be prohibited dropped out of sight. Their original recommendations were definitely brought to a vote in the House of Deputies, under the leadership of Dr. Mead of Connecticut and Dr. Goodwin of Pennsylvania, and were defeated by a small but sufficient majority. Their defeat was due to the memorable words spoken at the last moment of the debate by the Rev. James de Koven of Wisconsin. His utterance simply made any repressive canon about ritual impossible without rending the Church. It had been falsely assumed all along that the question at issue was one of ceremonial, whereas, in fact, it was one of doctrine. Dr. de Koven's challenge. "The objection which I have to this canon or any other like it," said Dr. de Koven, "is that it bears upon (disputed) doctrine, and seems to settle it in one direction. Now, questions of doctrine should not be settled by any canon which does not bear directly upon doctrine. If people teach false doctrine they should be tried and punished according to that canon. I wish now to give any in this house the opportunity to present me for false doctrine if he wishes, and in order to do so I will use language which I will explain presently. I believe in 'the real actual presence of our Lord under the form of Bread and Wine upon our altars. I myself adore, and if necessary or my duty, teach my people to adore Christ present in the elements under the form of bread and wine.' I use these words because they are a bald statement of the Real Presence. But I use them for another reason; they are adjudicated words. They are words which, used by a divine of the Church of England, have been tried in the highest ecclesiastical court of England, and have been decided by that court to come within the limits of the truth allowed in the Church of England. Sir Robert Philemore has decided that if he should pronounce these words wrong he should be passing judgement, he should be passing sentence, upon a long roll of illustrious divines who have adorned our universities and fought the good fight of our Church, from Ridley to Keble, from the divine whom the cross at Oxford commemorates to the divine in whose honor that University has just finished her last College."

Things for-bidden.

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1871, p. 599.

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1871, p. 267.

JAMES DE KOVEN

There was nothing more to be said. If holding and teaching the doctrine was unlawful, then common manliness and honor demanded the presentment of Dr. de Koven, and those who agreed with him, for heresy. If the doctrine was permissible, then the ceremonial that symbolized it was, a fortiori, permissible. The question at issue was the comprehensiveness of the Church. Was it broad enough to contain within it the priest and the prophet? At that time the priest asked only for standing ground and living room. He did not dream of controlling the organization or of denouncing the prophet for looseness of doctrine. He won his victory because he had the logic on his side, and, what was of more consequence, he saved the Church from herself.

The Church's comprehensiveness.

The House of Bishops and the champions of Protestantism in the lower house were let down easy by the practically unanimous adoption of a vague resolution that, "This Convention hereby expresses its decided condemnation of all ceremonies, observances and practices which are fitted to express a doctrine foreign to the authorized standards of the Church." The ritual controversy was ended. A new lot of pamphlets and editorial articles were harvested and added to the pile of the same sort¹ of literature which previous years had produced, and have been forgotten altogether. Ceremonial which had its root in sentimentalism or æsthetics died a natural death. The sense of humor among Americans is too strong to allow that sort of folly to endure. But the Church had vindicated once again her comprehensiveness. There is a place within her for those who hold to the sacramental theory of the Ministry and the supernatural theory of the Sacraments. They are at liberty to teach and to symbolize their belief, provided they do not denounce or try to proscribe their more numerous brethren who do not agree with them.

The end of controversy.

¹ I have not thought it well to accumulate references or footnotes to that mass of controversial literature concerning "Ritualism" which was produced between 1865 and 1875. Neither its temper nor its intrinsic value was fitted to save it from the oblivion into which it has properly fallen.

MORGAN DIX

CHAPTER XIV.

PEACE WITH HONOR.

WHEN the General Convention had, by its action in 1871, tacitly affirmed the Church's comprehensiveness there came a moment of doubt and hesitation on the part of some who had hoped and expected a different issue. High Churchmen who had strenuously opposed Ritualism because it threatened confusion to existing order found little difficulty in the situation. They had opposed certain innovations because they believed them to be contrary to law. When it appeared that the law was not quite what they had believed it to be their very instinct of legality led them to acquiesce. They loved ritualism none the more, but the Church having, albeit grudgingly, pronounced its right to be, they would obey the Church.¹ While they did not like either the theory of the Church or the rationale of the Sacraments, which it symbolized, they liked still less those of the other extreme. But there were not a few who thought that they never could be reconciled to the situation. Not only was the Church in danger, but the truth of God was jeopardized. Justification by faith, the articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesie, was passing out of sight, or only found hearty expression in the Protestant Churches. Those perplexity.

Evangelical

¹ Brand : Life of Bishop Wittingham, vol. ii. ch. 7.

¹ Harrison : Life of Bishop Kerfoot, vol. ii. p. 529.

of this way of thinking had long desired that on that side of the Church where her frontier marches with Protestantism, the line of delimitation should be drawn as vaguely as might be. When Dr. Hubbard preached in a Baptist meeting house in Westerly, R. I., and the younger Dr. Stephen Tyng invaded the ecclesiastical territory of the Rev. Messrs. Stubbs and Boggs to preach in a Methodist Church in New Jersey, the action was characterized as liberality and church fellowship. They did not believe that any legitimate frontier had been trespassed upon because they did not believe that there actually was any frontier—on that side. But now, when it became evident that there were those in the Church who desired equal liberty in precisely the opposite direction, they were filled with anxiety. This anxiety deepened into real alarm when it began to appear that the law of the Church as it stood was likely to be enforced with much more rigor against those guilty of “fault by defect of ritual observance” than those from excess. The temper of the whole Church was bad. Charity and magnanimity were sadly wanting. A pestilent band of partisan journals misnamed “religious” newspapers were doing their best, not in the interest of truth, but of party advantage. The “Church Journal” and the “Protestant Churchman” and the “Standard of the Cross” were doing their worst to egg their several parties to mutual proscription. The Low Churchman had reason to be afraid. Like the Ritualists, they had been in the habit of finding relief for their consciences in divagations from the letter of the rubrics. It began to look as if they would be estopped from this, and at the point where they were most sensitive. In 1868 the Rev. Charles E. Cheney of Chicago had been brought to trial by his Bishop for having habitually omitted the word "regenerate" in the use of the Baptismal Office. The Evangelicals had fallen into the popular habit of conceiving that the word "regeneration" connoted an internal, conscious transformation of the qualities of the soul. If this were its force it could not properly be used to describe the effect of Baptism upon an unconscious infant. Their contention was that, whatever might be the grace vouchsafed in Baptism, such grace was contingent upon its being properly administered by a duly commissioned person, and not at all upon the enunciation of any dogmatic theory pronounced by the minister in connection with the administration of the rite. They therefore quietly omitted the offensive phrase. Their critics did not, of course, call in question the validity of the Baptism thus administered, but they were scandalized, or affected to be, by the open violation of rubrical provision. In more pacific times the abuse, as it unquestionably was, would have corrected itself by the better information of those who fell into it. At the General Convention of 1871 the following "Declaration," signed by forty-eight bishops, was communicated to the Lower House

Bishops' declaration on regeneration. action of the Bishops in a matter of much gravity." "We the subscribers, being asked in order to the quieting of the consciences of sundry ministers of the Church, to declare our conviction as to the meaning of the word 'Regenerate,' in the Office for the Ministration of Baptism of Infants, do declare that in our opinion the word ' Regenerate ' is not there so used as to declare that a moral change in the subject of Baptism is wrought in the Sacrament."

This declaration, bearing as it did the signatures of theologians whose bias was as diverse as that of Whittingham and Lee, Williams and Cummins, would in ordinary times have sufficed to remove the difficulty. It did remove it for all future time. The question has never been agitated since. But, unfortunately, Cheney had been tried and deposed in the mean time. And what made it worse was the fact that his trial had been conducted with so little regard to equity, by such high-handed arbitrariness on the part of the Bishop and court, that on an appeal to the secular courts it was set aside in so far as it affected Mr. Cheney's rectorship and emoluments.

The effect of the treatment of Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., Mr. Cheney, and other like occurrences convinced not a few among the Low Churchmen that the Church was being intentionally made too strait for them. So good a Churchman and so temperate a man as Dr. Sparrow of Virginia did not hesitate to declare that " There is a freedom for the offending Ritualist and a stringency of canon for the offending Evangelical which is wholly inexcusable. While such men as Ewer and Curtis are allowed to add or take away in their services with perfect freedom, others like Tyng and Cheney, upon a slight indiscretion, or for the omission of a word, are immediately under the Episcopal maul for discipline or for destruction." ¹

¹ Sparrow's Life and Correspondence, p. 350.

While Cheney's trial was going on, Dr. Sparrow wrote: "If he is condemned we shall have another Episcopal Church in these United States. We have the Romish, the Moravian, the Greek, the Swedish and the Protestant Episcopal. Why not the 'Reformed Episcopal'?"¹ This ill-omened word had already been spoken in more than one quarter. Men's hearts were failing them for fear. The fact was that all parties in the Church were shaken with ill-concealed terror, and fear is at once the most suspicious as well as the most tyrannical of emotions. Each feared that his own favorite beliefs would be proscribed and those of his adversaries allowed. It is difficult to say whether, at the time, solicitude to defend his own truth or solicitude to suppress the other man's error predominated. In the summer of 1868 a Conference of Low Churchmen had been held in Chicago, presided over by the Hon. Felix R. Brunot. In the discussions of this Conference the words "withdrawal," "secession," "a Reformed Episcopal Church" were heard more than once. There was no intimation that such a project was seriously entertained. On the contrary, the terms were never used except with deprecation. But the use of the word showed that the thought was there. One member of the Conference euphemistically expressed it: "We do not contemplate secession; we contemplate being driven out."² gauntlet lay on the floor of the General Convention, there was nothing for the irreconcilables to do but acquiesce or to withdraw from the Church. There were few, if any, who really wished to secede. It is one thing to talk about self-expatriation in the heat of political strife, but it is a different thing to actually embark upon the craft which is ready to bear one away from his native land. Nothing could be more pathetic than the surprise and grief of the few who did secede when they discovered that most of those who had joined with them in denunciation of the Church's abuses proposed to remain with her.

When the proposed drastic canon against Ritual failed of adoption in 1871, and when Dr. de Koven's

¹ Sparrow's Life and Correspondence, p. 297.

² Church Journal, 1868, p. 197.

The task of leading out the malcontents was left to one whose life within the Church had been brief. The Rev. Dr. George David Cummins, Assistant Bishop of Kentucky, had been a bishop seven years, and had been in the Church fifteen years when he left it. It is not very clear why he came or why he went. He had been a Methodist minister, earnest, devout, useful, and gifted with an eloquence more fluent and fervid than profound or cogent. On the 2d of December, 1873, he met, according to a call previously issued and widely circulated, with eight clergymen and twenty laymen at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York and organized the "Reformed Episcopal Church."¹ It does not lie in our way to follow the history of that body. It can scarcely be said to have had any history. To the candid observer there seemed at the time to be no raison d'être for it, and none such has since appeared.¹ Its effect upon the Church by drawing from her membership has not been appreciable. Things being as they were, that some should be so ill at ease in the Church during the early seventies that they should feel bound to withdraw, was natural. No generous man will blame them overmuch. There was no need, however, to add a superfluous one to the already too numerous Protestant Churches. But the establishment of the Reformed Episcopal Church proved to be an almost unqualified gain to all concerned, except to those who composed it. It gave a salutary shock to all parties in the distracted Church. While it was a secession which caused little loss, though among those who went out were men who could but ill be spared, still it demonstrated that secession is always possible. Much of the ill humors of the Church seemed to have escaped through the wound made in her body by the excision. At any rate, the temper of the Church began slowly to improve. The whole question of Churchmanship was taken up again in a better spirit. In a few places "ritualistic" fanatics were relentlessly prosecuted by the ancient champions of Evangelicalism, and in a few cases "advanced" men abused the Church's hospitality, but as a whole the Church passed onward into a broader and better life.

¹ Ayerigg: Memoirs of the Reformed Episcopal Church. A somewhat rare volume, which contains a valuable but undigested mass of information concerning the whole subject.

¹ After twenty-five years it now contains about a hundred feeble congregations scattered through the United States and Canada.

CHAPTER XV.

PRAYER-BOOK REVISION.

WHEN all parties in the Church had reached the point of honestly desiring peace, and of frankly accepting comprehensiveness as one of the Church's notes, the way was open to undertake an enterprise which had long been in mind. If the Church were to be the permanent home of men of diverse and varied tastes the order and arrangement of the house must needs be adjusted with some view to their comfort. No change had been made in the Prayer-Book since its adoption in 1789. Since that time the most wonderful century in human history had unrolled itself. A new world had come in. While the heavens remained the same a new earth had appeared. It is a condition of divine worship that the consciousness of human needs and the thought concerning God should fit with one another. During the century the Church had enormously expanded her terrestrial view. She had awakened to a sense of her relationship with human society, and a hundred new phases of that society confronted her. The sense of adoration itself had taken on new moods. The Prayer-Book had been finally put in form with a view to serve as a vehicle for a decorous and decent expression adjusted to the worship of a Church whose self-consciousness was narrow and whose range of emotions was meagre. All that had changed. The Church was now concerning herself with the multiform life of the new age. The Prayer-Book was inadequate. This "The Prayer-Book as it is." inadequacy had been felt for a long while, but there had been no time when it was possible to correct it. The mere fact of the Prayer-Book's changelessness had gained for it a sort of sentimental sanctity. Churchmen had come to think of it as they did of the Holy Scriptures. It was a finality. The mere suggestion of alteration was a profanity.

When a proposal was made in the General Convention of 1865 to correct certain typographical errors in the "Table for Proper Psalms," it was gravely decided that such discrepancies were "intentional, and as such made an integral part of our American Book of Common Prayer." Changes in the Prayer-Book in the interest of Doctrine had been more than once sought, but had always been refused. Each party in turn was but half-hearted in pressing the changes which it desired, from fear lest the door being opened, the other party might bring in at it changes which would be dangerous. But now the time had come when a more fundamental need began to be felt. The Prayer-Book order was being departed from on this side and on that under the stress of an imperative necessity which no rubrics could stand against. Shortened forms for use in the Sunday-school had to be. When the Prayer-Book was adopted there were no Sunday-schools. Shorter and more flexible forms were needed for missions and occasional services. This need had not been thought of when the Prayer-Book had been adopted. The new wine of life stirring in the Church was bursting the old bottles. How could the most conservative Churchman use full Morning Prayer in a congregation of Freedmen, not one in ten of whom could read, or comprehend it when read? How could a mission priest be rubrical at an evangelistic service? Changes in the customs of living made necessary shorter and more frequent services on Sunday. To be rubrical meant to be dangerously tedious. Morning Prayer, Litany, Sermon, and Holy Communion involved a devotional strain of two hours or more, and two hours was a far longer space of time for the people of 1876 than it had been for their more deliberate forbears of 1776. Some relief was found in the fortunate discovery which the House of Bishops made and announced, that "Morning Prayer, Litany and Holy Communion were separate and distinct offices," and that it had always been lawful to use one or more of them independently of the others, provided that neither of them were habitually disused. The dictum was accepted with some hesitation. Possibly it was sound, but custom was against it, the rubrics themselves were a trifle obstinate, and in any case the Church was not quite clear as to the Bishops' authority to express an opinion in the premises. Some found relief by supplementing the liturgy with extemporaneous prayers. They contended that when they had once delivered the required tale of rubrical bricks they were free to mould the clay left over according to their own design. But the expedient was not satisfactory. The extemporaneous prayers were an unseemly patch on a stately garment. But it became clear that something must be done. There was grave fear lest the fetich of "Uniformity" should be dishonored. The ideal of the average Churchman had long been not only that "all men everywhere should call upon God," but they should call upon Him in the same words at the same time. It had been their boast that, while change and confusion existed elsewhere, a Churchman could go of a Sunday into any Church in the broad land with the certainty that he would hear and join in a service every word of which was not only hallowed, but familiar. This ideal had been actually realized, and for a considerable time maintained. But now it was being threatened. Would it not be better, they asked, to allow the Prayer-Book to be enriched with new offices and rendered more adaptable in its use of old ones than to run the risk of allowing lawlessness and variety to come in under the plea of necessity?

Separation of offices.

This course commended itself the more by the fact that now there were men capable of doing the needed work. Fifty years earlier there had been no Science of Liturgics. There had been Commentaries upon the Prayer-Book, and treatises abundant upon the doctrinal enormities of the Missal. But these were either for the ends of edification or controversy, and threw little light upon the origin, the structure, or the philosophy of public and common worship. But within half a century all that had been changed. "Probably no period of corresponding length in the whole range of English Church history had shown itself so rich in the fruits of Liturgical study."¹ Palmer had, with infinite learning and pains, traced the Origines Liturgicæ; Maskell had recovered the Rituals of the past and collated them; Bright had gathered together and translated the Ancient Collects; John Mason

¹ Huntington : History of the Book of Common Prayer, p. 82.

The science of liturgics. Neale, Cardwell, Stephens, Lathbury, Procter, Scudamore, and a fine company of scholars and historians had created a science of Liturgics, as new and as real as the New Chemistry, or Political Economy. This knowledge had passed over to this side of the water, been absorbed, assimilated, and added to.

In the General Convention of 1877 the following resolution was offered by the Rev. Dr. Wm. R. Huntington:

“Resolved: that a joint Committee to consist of seven Bishops, seven presbyters and seven laymen be chosen to consider and report to the next Convention what changes, if any, are needed in the rubrics in the Book of Common Prayer in order to remove existing difficulties of interpretation, to amend the Lectionary, and to provide by abbreviation or otherwise for the better adaptation of the services of the Church to the wants of all sorts and conditions of men.”

This was the formal beginning of a movement for the revision of the Liturgy which engrossed the attention and absorbed the energies of the Church for more than a dozen years. At first it seemed to be started in vain. Although the judgment and conscience of the Church were enlisted, its inertia and blind conservatism blocked the way. The Committee on the Prayer-Book to which the resolution was referred recommended through its chairman, the Rev. Dr. Beardsley, that it be discharged from further consideration of the matter, and the recommendation was adopted.¹

The time was ripe, and the Church was ready, but the General Convention did not know it.

Three years later, in 1880, the Rev. Dr. Huntington again moved for the same joint commission to "consider and report to the next General Convention, whether, in view of the fact that this Church is soon to enter upon the second century of its organized existence in this country, the changed conditions of national life do not demand certain alterations in the Book of Common Prayer, in the direction of Liturgical enrichment and increased flexibility of use."

Revision begun.

The discussions during the three years preceding had already shown that the mind of the Church was fixed upon such movement. The resolution was passed and the Commission appointed.²

In 1883 the Commission reported the result of their work with a proposed "Prayer-Book Annexed" thereto. The changes and additions recommended were named in a statement of forty-five printed pages. In general, the Book Annexed provided for the omission of a few obsolete prayers, and for a clarification of rubrical obscurities; for the restoration to the original form of certain mutilated or curtailed anthems and canticles; for the addition of many prayers and thanksgivings and of a few new offices; and chiefly to break up the interlaced and cumbrous plan of binding together separate services. The Commission specially disavowed any changes touching the statements or standards of doctrine, and they claimed to have been guided "by those principles of liturgical construction and ritual use which have made the Book of Common Prayer what it is."

The Book Annexed.

¹ Journal Gen. Con., 1877, p. 132.

² The commission was composed of Bishops Williams, Lay, Stevens, Coxé, Young, Doane, and Huntington; the Rev. Drs. Huntington, Dalrymple, Goodwin, Dix, Harwood, and Harrison; Messrs. Hamilton Fish, Henry Copee, Hugh W. Sheffey, E. T. Wilder, John W. Andrews, James M. Smith, Hill Burgwin.

The Commission's proposal met a not very hospitable welcome. Literary precisians criticised it for fault in taste. Some attacked it because the changes proposed were so few and so trivial that it was not worth while to upset established custom in order to adopt them; and some because they were so numerous and radical that their adoption would be revolutionary. Some saw in it a covert attack upon accepted doctrine, and some faulted because it failed to utilize the opportunity to teach catholic truth. In Virginia it was charged with Mariolatry; in Ohio with Latitudinarianism; in Wisconsin with Puritanism.¹ High Churchmen saw in its adoption the final breaking down of ritual uniformity, and Broad Churchmen saw in it the attempt to bring in again the tyranny of mechanical rule. In any case the General Convention declined to adopt it. After weeks passed in a minute examination of the Book, line by line, in the "Committee of the Whole," the subject was referred to the next Convention. When six more years had passed, and the proposed changes had been winnowed by discussion in newspapers, pamphlets, current discussion, and diocesan conventions, a Revised Prayer-

¹ Huntington: History of Prayer-Book Revision, p. 157.

Book was finally adopted, and the agitation was ended for a long time to come. Some gain had been made. The enrichment was but meagre. A Collect, Epistle, and Gospel were added for the Feast of Transfiguration. A Penitential Office was inserted. Certain Canticles were restored to their integrity, and the Nunc Dimittis and Magnificat replaced. Sundry Versicles and Collects were added. In the way of rubrical ease and flexibility much was gained. It was made possible to bring a public service within a reasonable compass of time without straining rubrics. But the greatest gain was attained unconsciously and unintentionally. The fetich of "Uniformity" was quietly pushed from its shrine. During the years of agitation and uncertainty, of dubiety concerning rubrics, of experimental and tentative regulation, men learned that it is of more consequence that a Service should edify the particular congregation engaged in it than that it should coincide at every period with the service in which other congregations are engaged at the same hour. They learned that the Prayer-Book was for the Church, and not the Church for the Prayer-Book. They came to realize that the Book of Common Prayer is not rightly a manual of instruction as to how Divine Service shall be performed, but an ideal to which such service ought to conform.

Since this truth came to be perceived and gained currency the Liturgy has taken on a new life. It has come to be an angel bidding the devout soul to prayer, and ceased to be a tyrannous master of rites commanding a ceremonial.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CHURCH SEEKING FELLOWSHIP.

WHEN the Church of England awoke at the middle of the century to a consciousness of her catholicity she was dismayed at her isolation. She began to draw back unconsciously from her Protestant friendships, but only then did she begin to realize the width and depth of the chasms which divided her from the other branches of the Catholic Church. The American Church was oppressed by the sense of loneliness still more. In Great Britain the Church was, and is, so great and strong, and touches the Christian world at so many points, that she is, to a great degree, sufficient unto herself. But the American Church is small and her life meagre. Unlike her English mother, she does not hold conspicuous place in the world of politics, education, or social order. The sense of ecclesiastical loneliness has led her into persistent effort to find fellowship and prove kinship with Churches remote in space and alien in history and temper. These wanderings in search of legitimate brethren have only been saved from grotesqueness by their pathos. The result has been but small. Not seldom the proffered recognition has been answered by a perfunctory courtesy which but thinly veiled indifference or doubt of her legitimacy.

In 1868 a Memorial was presented to the General Convention entreating that body "to take into immediate and prayerful consideration the question whether it is not alike your duty and your privilege to at once open up formal negotiations with the authorities of the Russian Church, and if it seems good to you, with the other orthodox Churches of the East." In response a joint Commission was appointed to go or send upon this quest. In 1871 the Commission reports that they had joined with those of the English Church interested in the same end, and that by their endeavors the Archbishop of Canterbury had been moved to send a brotherly epistle to the Patriarch of Constantinople, enclosing with it a copy of the Prayer-Book, and praying the good offices of the Orthodox Clergy to baptize the children, minister to the sick, and bury the dead of such members of the Anglican Communion as might be travelling or sojourning in the Orient. To this missive the Patriarch replied, after the complimentary style of the East, that he "had received with the greatest joy the highly esteemed letter sent by your Holiness to our humility, and are rejoiced to the bottom of our heart," and saying that the Clergy of the East are always ready, "even if not expressly exhorted by any of the Venerable British Bishops to offer any facility to bury English strangers who die here." As to baptizing their children, he remains politely silent. As to the Prayer-Book, he says that he has examined it with care to see how far it bears out the statement of its Preface that it "contains nothing contrary to the Word of God and to sound doctrine."

The result of such examination shows a condition of things which "throws us into suspense." These things are the teaching of the Prayer-Book concerning the eternal existence of the Holy Spirit; the number of the Sacraments; concerning Apostolic Tradition; concerning the Divine Eucharist; the discourteous assertion that "the Churches of Jerusalem, Alexandria and Antioch have erred;" and the essentials generally of "the distinguished Confession of the XXXIX Articles." The final judgment of the Patriarch is that "we will therefore pray with our soul to the Author and Finisher of our salvation to enlighten the understanding of all with the light of His knowledge, and to make all nations of one speech, of the one faith, and of the one love, and of the one hope of the gospel; that with one mouth and with one heart, as children of one and the same mother, the Church—the first born and Catholic Church—we may glorify the Triune God."¹

With this devout aspiration, in which all parties concerned could join, even though it was not quite what some had asked for, the negotiations with the Oriental Church came to rest. At that point they still stand.

The ecclesiastical Japhet in search of a brother next turned his steps towards the "Italian Reform Movement." In this case, as there were no Italian reform. bishops likely to be open to negotiation, the Commission appointed consisted of Clergy and laity, with the Bishop of Western New York as its honorary president.²

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1871, Appendix vi.

² Gen. Con. Journal, 1874, Appendix v.

The promulgation of the Papal Infallibility dogma and the overthrow of the Papal States was the occasion of a widespread commotion within the Roman Church. It was hoped and believed that the agitation and dissatisfaction among some of her bishops and many of her priests and laymen might be brought to a head and guided to an open revolt. It presently became evident, however, that this was not to be. The centre of agitation moved from Italy and passed to Switzerland, Holland, and the Rhine. When it took the form of the "Old Katholik Movement," it found the Bishops of Maryland and Pittsburg to meet and fraternize with it at Bonn and Cologne. The movement never possessed vitality or hope. Once again the American Church was disappointed in the comradeship she hoped from it.

The next move was towards Mexico. Although the final outcome of this venture was about equally disappointing, the outlook was far more encouraging and the reasons for intervention were nobler.

The same social and political forces which overthrew the Papal rule in Italy broke down the authority of the Church in Mexico. A reform movement had set in there after the overthrow of Santa Anna in 1855. How widespread and powerful it became it is not easy to know. It is a fact, at any rate, that as many as seventy-four priests ventured to sign a protest and memorial against the abuses and corruptions of the Romish Church. When Juarez came into power he took the malcontents under his protection, and gave them two churches in the City of Mexico.

Mexico. Upon his fall, brought about by the combined French, English, and Spanish influences, the "Reformed Church" disappeared from sight. Two intrepid priests, Martinez and Dominguez, after two years of exile in the United States, returned to Matamoras at the mouth of the Rio Grande, and tried to re-collect their scattered flocks. Farther south Aguillar, another priest of high character and noble repute, stood fast by the cause of reform. Notwithstanding that guarantees of religious liberty had been repealed, a considerable body of Mexicans, how many is not known, maintained a loose and precarious organization against the tyrannies of the Roman Church. In 1866 the Presiding Bishop, Hopkins, was notified that the "New Christian Church in Mexico" had nominated the presbyter Rafael Diaz Martinez for Bishop, and asked for his consecration at the hands of the American Bishops. Bishop Hopkins was obliged to reply that there were canonical hindrances in the way, and that their request could not be entertained. Two years later a commission from the Mexican reformers came to New York in the same cause, and, by accident, made the acquaintance of the Rev. Henry C. Riley, an American priest who had been reared in Chili, and whose mother-tongue was Spanish. Dr. Riley being possessed of private fortune, not being bound by parochial ties in the United States, and being practically a South American Spaniard in temperament, took up the case of the Mexican priests with ardor and returned with them to Mexico. Just how successful were the labors of himself and his confrères is impossible to be learned. In 1874 they write of twenty-seven regular congregations, five of these being in the capital city. But both before and after that time returns of the most discrepant character were forthcoming. Sometimes it would appear that a wave of reform was sweeping abroad which this Church had only to guide in order to constitute a new national Church. But Contradictory reports from Mexico. almost by the next mail would come the report that the reform had practically died out. The truth seems to have been that the conditions necessary to the creating of a reformed Church were never present. No Latin people have ever conducted to a successful issue a revolt against Rome. The Teuton sharply separates in thought between his religious and his political life, and arranges the machinery of the one without reference to the other. The Latin steadily confuses them. Thus the "New Christian Church in Mexico" felt every shifting current of political air. It dissolved and recombined in a way which first bewildered and then exasperated the American Church, who tried to make businesslike terms with it. Concerning no portion of the Church's missionary work have there been such contradictory reports as concerning the Church in Mexico. It is possible that all the reports were true, for the reason that they were made about a contradictory body.

In August, 1874, a council was held in the City of Mexico and a memorial adopted to the Bishops of the American Church:

"We, members of the Synod of the Church of Jesus in Mexico—a branch of the Christian Church that desires to preserve in all its purity the primitive faith, and in all their integrity the order and ministry of the Church, solicit the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States to take such measures as may lead to the granting us the Episcopate, we being ready to give the necessary guarantees for the maintenance of the faith and the due order in the ministry of the Church."

This memorial was presented to the House of Bishops in 1874, and occasioned a lively interest in the Church generally. By Article X of the Constitution the power to consecrate Bishops "for foreign countries on due application therefor" is lodged in the House of Bishops. The power to grant the petition of the memorial was unquestioned. But two preliminary questions were to be answered. Can this Church, without violating Catholic custom and law, intrude her Episcopate within the borders of territory where there already is a branch of the Catholic Church? It was brought to mind that when Bishop Southgate had been sent to Constantinople, thirty years earlier, it had only been done after every precaution had been taken to guard against even the semblance of intrusion within a Church quite as corrupt as the Roman Church in Mexico; that no one had even so much as ventured to suggest the consecration of a bishop for our mission in Greece; and that the failure of the Constantinople project might well be regarded as a penalty for the violation of Catholic rule. To this it was replied that giving the Episcopate to a church already organized was quite a different matter from going "bishoping in another man's diocese"; that in any case it was too late in the day to raise the objection, inasmuch as more than one-half the territory of our own Church had possessed another Episcopate and had had within it a Catholic Church when it became part of the United States; that the same academic argument which would preclude an entrance into Mexico would have shut us out from the whole "Louisiana Purchase," from Texas, and from California. Not a few sympathized with the Bishop of Connecticut, who roundly maintained that the Church of Rome, by her enormities in doctrine and practice, had forfeited her place in the Catholic sisterhood, so that no terms of comity were bounden as towards her. But a second and more practical question took precedence of the academic one: Was there a Reformed Church in Mexico? Whom and how many did the memorialists represent?

As is the custom in such affairs, a Commission was appointed for the business.¹ Whether this Commission was created "with power to act," or only to examine and report, afterwards gave rise to much dispute. In 1875 Bishop Lee proceeded to Mexico to look into the situation. He found and visited in the City of Mexico one congregation of four or five hundred people, "largely of the humbler class, and with the prevailing type of feature and complexion strongly Indian." At the same time there was handed to him a list of about thirty other congregations throughout the country. His search for

Mexican commission appointed.

¹ Bishops Whittingham, Lee of Delaware, Bedell, Coxe, Kerfoot, and Littlejohn.

facts does not appear to have been either very thorough or very intelligent, but he plainly was convinced of the existence of a Reformed Church in Mexico. On strength of that conviction he confirmed upward of a hundred persons, and ordained seven candidates who were presented, to the Diaconate and Priesthood. When he returned to the United States he brought with him a proposed form of concordat between the House of Bishops and the "Junta Central of the Church of Jesus in Mexico." By the terms of this agreement the party of the first part was to consecrate one or more persons as bishops; and by a Commission or otherwise, to administer the affairs of the new Church until it should possess at least three bishops of its own. The party of the second part pledges itself to hold to the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds as its doctrinal formula: to maintain the Episcopal ministry and regimen; and not to receive or establish any doctrines or articles of belief contrary to the formularies of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

All looked promising. It appeared as though, if not a nation, at any rate a Church had been born in a day. But, as months went on, uneasiness spread. Bishop Whittingham was disturbed at the looseness of doctrine and the indifference to truth displayed by the new Church.¹ A copy of the liturgy in use had fallen into his hands, which he pronounced monstrous. Bishop Kerfoot, with his plain sense, declared that he had "been grievously disappointed as to the evidence of the existence of any Mexican Church, properly speaking, or in the sense of Article X of our Constitution."¹ The situation was difficult. Bishop Lee had recognized the Church and ordained ministers for it. Two Candidates for Bishops were ready and waiting. If nothing were done the new organization would either be reabsorbed by Rome or would drift into the Presbyterian or Methodist Churches, both of whom were present and active in the field. After five years of hesitation the Commission were fain to be content with such assurances and guarantees of doctrinal soundness as they could get, and in April, 1879, they consecrated the Rev. Dr. Riley Bishop of the Valley of Mexico. It soon became apparent to all candid observers both that there really was no national organization which could be called a Mexican Church within the intent of Article X of the Constitution, and that Bishop Riley was as far as possible from being the proper head of such a society as did exist. The promised Prayer-Book was not forthcoming; debts were contracted without authority, and were not paid; property which was supposed to belong to the Church was found to be in the personal name of the Bishop. After five years of inconsequential work, Bishop Riley resigned his jurisdiction into the hands of the Commission which had consecrated him, and the "Mexican Church" lapsed into its present status of a mission carried on under the general oversight and authority of the Presiding Bishop.

¹ Brand: Life of Whittingham, vol. ii. p. 258.

¹ "For myself I feel bound to say that without a disavowment of such a production no Iglesia calling itself de Jesus, however loud in its profession of holiness, catholicity, apostolicity and Christianity could obtain my consent to any such recognition as is proposed."

Consecration of Bishop Riley.

¹ Brand : Life of Whittingham, p. 260.

While the Church was waiting in humble attitude before the Patriarch of Constantinople, coquetting ponderously with the Old Catholics and dreaming of an Episcopal Church in Mexico, an incomprehensible perversity led her to call in question and then suspend her fraternal relations with the two Episcopal Churches at her door. For half a century Moravian and Swedish Orders had been acknowledged without question. The Moravians were a small body, and their path rarely crossed that of this Church, but the validity of their Episcopate had always been recognized, and was in fact beyond question.¹ With the Church of Sweden Anglican relations had been most intimate in the past, and the immigration of thousands of Swedes made it all the more important that those relations should be maintained. In Colonial times the Bishop of London had commissioned priests in Swedish orders to officiate in American Churches,² and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel had paid them their stipends.³ In 1837 the Bishop of London had officially requested a bishop of the Swedish Church to confirm for him. In 1861 the punctilious Bishop of Illinois accepted the Rev. Jacob Bredberg "on his letters of orders from the Bishop of Skara," and the same year Bishop Whitehouse celebrated the Holy Communion in the royal chapel of Stockholm. Notwithstanding all this, the Church began twenty years ago to feel, or at least to affect, a doubt of the validity of the Moravian and

¹ Ritter : Moravian Church in Philadelphia, p. 223.

² De Schweinitz : History of the Unitas Fratrum, p. 647.

³ Past and Present : G. Hammerskold, p. 7.

⁴ Records of Holy Trinity : Old Swedes Church, p. 26.

Swedish pedigree. Commissions were appointed upon both questions. The offence to both was great, and would seem to have been gratuitous. Those whom the Church had heretofore treated as sisters suddenly had the legitimacy of their birth called in question. Thus far neither Commission has seen its way to report yes or no.

Meanwhile the Church's isolation weighed upon her more and more. In the midst of a Christian nation she was without companionship. Realizing more intensely than any other section of American Christianity the imperativeness of organic unity, she appeared of all others to be most entirely outside the sphere of practical friendship. She had been led by ecclesiastical doctrinaires into a false position. Her natural and historical relations were with the Protestant world in the midst of which she lived. That this was her own conviction when permitted to speak her real mind appeared at the General Convention of 1886. From the Diocese of Indiana came a memorial praying the Church in this General Convention assembled "to issue to the Christian world an open letter embodying her principles, her suggestions, and her prayers for Christian unity." The Diocese of Kentucky presented a similar petition, and reminded the Convention that Central Pennsylvania had adopted a like resolution. The Diocese of Louisiana sent up a memorial begging the Convention to instruct its Committee on Ecclesiastical Relationship to "abandon the passive policy hithertofore followed in respect to those bodies of Christians generally recognized as Evangelicals; and to send overtures in writing to the governing unity movement.

The Church

bodies of the said several denominations, inviting them to conference on the matter of Church Unity." Petitions also came up from Texas, Iowa, and Pennsylvania. But the unmistakable temper of the Church was shown by a General Memorial, signed by thirty-two bishops and eleven hundred clergy and more than three thousand laymen, praying the General Convention to take "such action as it may deem expedient to further the organic unity of Christians in this land." The memorialists urged this action on the statesmanlike grounds that in this new land denominational dissensions have not yet crystallized into hardness as in older lands; that a desire for unity is plainly growing; that a more lively interest is being shown by those without in the doings of the Church; that Churchmen have become more ready to acknowledge the vast amount of truth which other Christian bodies hold in common with them; that party lines are vanishing within the Church; that the Church Idea and the desire for liturgical expression are spreading everywhere; that there is a universal discontent with long and metaphysical Confessions, and the desire to be content with the simple and primitive Creeds.

All these memorials were referred to the "Committee on the State of the Church." A "Committee on Ecclesiastical Relations" had been in existence since 1874, but it had thus far manifested neither the ability nor the wish to discover any relations, except in some far country. The temper of the Church now demanded that something be done. It was therefore resolved to create a joint Commission on Christian Unity, whose policy should be to move out into the open and bear to the divided Christian world a definite message of good will and a proposal for union. Meanwhile the House of Bishops had been considering the same matter, and now announced the following:

“Declaration to whom it may concern, and especially to our fellow Christians of the different Communion in our land who, in their several spheres, have contended for the religion of Christ.

“1. Our earnest desire that the Saviour’s prayer that we all may be one, may, in its deepest and truest sense, be speedily fulfilled;

“2. That we believe that all who have been duly baptised with water in the name of the Father and of The Quadri- the Son and of the Holy Ghost are members lateral. of the Holy Catholic Church;

“3. That in all things of human ordering or of human choice relating to modes of worship and discipline, and to traditional customs, this Church is ready, in the spirit of love and humility, to forego all preferences of her own;

“4. That this Church does not seek to absorb other communions, but rather, coöperating with them on the basis of common faith and order, to discountenance schism, to heal the wounds of the body of Christ, and to promote the Charity which is the chief of Christian graces and the visible manifestation of Christ in the world.

“But furthermore we do hereby affirm that the Christian unity now so earnestly desired can be restored only by the return of all Christian communions to the principle of unity exemplified by the undivided Catholic Church during the first ages of its existence, which principles we believe to be the substantial deposit of Christian faith and rule committed by Christ and His Apostles to the Church unto the end of the world.

“As inherent parts of the sacred deposit, and therefore as essential to the restoration of unity among the divided branches of Christendom, we account the following, to wit:—

“I. The Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as the revealed word of God;

“II. The Nicene Creed as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith;

“III. The two Sacraments, baptism and the Supper of the Lord, ministered with unfailing use of Christ’s words and of the elements ordained by Him;

“IV. The historic episcopate, locally adapted in the method of its administration to the varying needs of the nations and peoples called of God into the unity of His Church.

“Furthermore, deeply grieved by the sad divisions which afflict the Christian Church in our own land, we hereby declare our desire and readiness, so soon as there shall be any authorized response to this Declaration, to enter into brotherly conference with all or any Christian bodies seeking the restoration of the organic unity of the Church.”

This declaration was adopted by the Lower House, and the joint Commission appointed and instructed to enter into negotiations in any directions which might open. No action of so great moment and so pregnant of possibilities had been taken by the American Church since its organization. There were but few who discerned its wide implications. When they began to appear, not a few stood aghast at what had been done and what it might involve. Was the declaration an ultimatum upon which the Church was willing to coalesce with any organization who might accept it? If so, did it, in its enumeration of things necessary, mean what it said? In that case, it was contended, the remitted Church might be found not only without the Prayer-Book, but without any liturgy; without any provision for Confirmation; without the Athanasian Creed or the XXXIX Articles; without any of those valued and endeared Ecclesiastical customs and arrangements which Churchmen had been accustomed to think of as part of the very Church herself. It was nothing less than a proposal to commit suicide in the hope of a vague and uncertain metempsychosis. It offered to abandon all distinctive Churchmanship in the interest of an iridescent dream. Even the President of the House of Deputies, upon whom devolved the duty of naming the men who were to execute it, disapproved of the scheme utterly.

As a matter of fact, it was suicidal in the sense that it proposed to the Church to lose her life that she might find it again. That suggestion has always seemed a hard saying to practical men. The more the proposition was discussed the more doubtful it became whether the Church either would or could stand to her offer in case it should be accepted by any large denomination.

Debate quickly concentrated itself on one unfortunate and ambiguous phrase. When the Church spoke of the "Historic Episcopate" it had in its mind that threefold historic ministry of unbroken Catholic custom—bishops, priests, and deacons. Protestant writers and speakers, on the other hand, not being familiar with that connotation, took the words for the face of them, and saw in the "Quadrilateral" nothing but an impudent proposal by the bishops to lord it over the rest of God's heritage. The Baptists responded to the overture with fraternal greeting, courteous but non-committal. The Methodists replied by reminding us that they possessed an Episcopate already quite good enough for their purposes. The Presbyterian General Assembly appointed a Committee of great dignity and character to confer with the Joint Commission. After several years of negotiation, sometimes hopeful and sometimes otherwise, the Committees came to a deadlock upon the demand that, as a condition of further correspondence, the Church must acknowledge practically the validity of Presbyterian orders, and their Committee was discharged. In the Convention of 1892 the Rev. Dr. Huntington offered an amendment to the Constitution which would have enabled any bishop without further ado to act in the spirit of the Declaration by receiving under his care any congregation which might be willing to accept its terms, even though it did not choose to conform to the ritual and custom of the Church or to become a component part of the organization. The amendment was lost by the failure of four dioceses to agree, and thus preventing a majority vote.¹ In 1895 substantially the same proposition was offered again in a modified form, and met a more decided rejection.

The Joint Commission still continues. The logic of events seems to be drawing the Church towards a point where she must either take practical measures to make good her proposal to the Protestant world or definitely withdraw her proffer. Meanwhile her action has had the effect to bring the question of Church unity out of the region of pious speculation and compel a place for it in practical ecclesiastical politics.

¹ Gen. Con. Journal, 1892, p. 329.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE RECENT PAST.

BY THE beginning of the new century it had become evident to every one that the "Quadrilateral" was but a brutum fulmen. Church Unity could never be achieved in that way. The Roman Church had already officially denied the validity of our Episcopate. The Protestant Churches could never be brought to any action which would even by inference acknowledge even a suspicion of the sufficiency of their own orders. And it had become plain that this Church would never translate the generous spirit of the Quadrilateral into official action. This, therefore, seemed to be a time to begin the whole matter again.

Accordingly there was created by the General Convention a "Commission on Faith and Order." The avowed purpose of this Commission, which was exceptionally strong in its personnel, was, not to propose terms of reunion, but to seek consultation with representatives of the Christian churches of the world, to ascertain as nearly as possible precisely what each one did really hold to be essential in Doctrine and Discipline; in a word, to strive toward a mutual understanding. To the advances of the Commission practically all the churches of the world responded. Even the Roman Catholics gave at least a civil reply. The whole Christian world was in fact slowly realizing the evils of separation. In every city, town, and village of the land are three times as many places of worship as the needs of the community require. The consequence is rivalry, jealousy, wastefulness, poverty, and impotence. The Commission found the evil recognized and deplored by nearly all. It was still hopefully conferring and corresponding, when the European War turned men's thoughts to other things. But this gave a demonstration on a great scale, to those who could see, that the unity of Christendom when it arrives will be the outcome not of any definitely formulated "Faith" or any well described system of "Order," but of a "Way of Life."

Commission
on Faith and Order.

Meanwhile the stream of the Church's life has run in other channels. These have been so many, so diverse, and so interlaced that it is difficult to determine which is the main current. The most the chronicler can do is to point to each one and indicate its present trend. He may also hazard a guess concerning the issue of each.

The first and most important of these may be indicated by the familiar and comprehensive term, Church Work. "Church Work." The phrase is modern because the thing is modern. The average parish as it is now and as it was forty years ago would scarcely recognize itself. Then it was composed of a group, large or small, of families who had built and who owned their church. Each one either owned or rented outright his "pew." The church was open once a week for services. There was a "Dorcas Society" of women who provided garments for the poor. There was a Sunday school in which the children of the parish were taught the Catechism and the Creed, and were told Bible stories. In a few cases a "Mission School" was maintained at some point remote from the parish church. But the parish had little consciousness of organic life and no consciousness of corporate responsibility. The Minister's duty was thought to be fulfilled when he preached two sermons on Sunday, baptized the children of his own people, administered the Holy Communion once a month, and held service twice a week in Lent. The private Christian thought his duty fulfilled when he confessed his own sins, endeavored to live a sober, righteous, and godly life, and gave an alms to the beggar at his gate.

But a new impulse was moving in society at large which found expression in the Church of England and in this Church first of all Christian bodies. The age of corporations had set in. Individual ownership was giving way to incorporated companies. Individual laborers were combining in labor unions. The individual was coming to count for less and less, and the organization for more and more. It was not alone a quickening of the spirit of altruism among Churchmen, but also that they were moved unconsciously by the spirit of the age. The result has been a transformation of the conception of the Church's function in society. It expressed itself first in organized parochial action for the relief of the poor in its own neighborhood. "Sodalities" and "guilds" were formed, district visitors were appointed, stated meetings were fixed for consultation, plans, and reports. The very word "guild" was new, because the thing for which the word stood was new in the Church. These organized activities grew and multiplied,—for the care of boys, of girls, of working men, communicants' classes, clubs, brotherhoods. Soon it became evident that these must have headquarters convenient and the erection of "Parish Houses" began. Though now deemed part of the ordinary equipment of a parish, and often built before the church itself, hardly one could be found in the country more than fifty years old. They have now come to provide chapels (sometimes), theatres, baths, tennis courts, reading rooms, quarters for baseball clubs and cross-country runners. The result has come about that the conception of the Minister's function has been transformed. He is no longer the preacher, pastor, and shepherd of a flock, but the General Manager of a complex and complicated organization. The qualities which make him efficient and successful are other than those once demanded. This has produced a profound change in the method of his training and equipment. Fortunate is his parish if he can still retain his power to receive his message from God and deliver it persuasively to men from his pulpit. There are those who can do so, but the price of organized efficiency must be paid at the cost of the personal power of the individual.

Age of Corporate
Action.

To the surprise of many, this outburst of Church work was presently followed by an alarming decrease of candidates for the Ministry. The Report on the State of the Church to the General Convention in 1895 first called serious attention to the situation. This has been repeated at every General Convention since. Of course this is due to many causes, the doubtfulness concerning doctrine, the scientific spirit of the age, the uncertainty of the Minister's message, the seduction of wealth, and a hundred others. But the one with which the Church is concerned is that the Minister of today is a new kind of creature, never before known in the Church's history, and there is a natural hesitancy about enlisting in its ranks or undertaking its multitudinous and ill defined duties. It may well be expected that the new movement, like all new movements, will in the end reach a more balanced accord with the Church's normal life.

The Modern Priest.

Closely related to the newly awakened activity in Church work was the rise and spread of "The Free Church System." In an earlier day parishes had been formed and maintained by a very simple method. A group of Church people finding themselves living near one another decided to build a church. Each one, for his contribution to the cost, became the owner or the perpetual tenant of a pew. This pew became the church home of himself, his family, his children, and maybe his children's children. When for any cause a family moved away, his pew was rented per annum to another family. The sense of proprietorship or tenant right was as real toward his pew as toward his house. It is true that hospitality was gladly offered to the stranger, but it was as hospitality and not as of right. It must be said that under this system the Church grew with as large a ratio as,

Free
Church
System.

and with a firmer stability than, since. The one great virtue of the method was that where a church was needed it was built by the people themselves without thought of appealing to the Church at large, and that churches were not built where they were not needed. Forty years ago nineteen-twentieths of the parishes were of this sort. Now nine-tenths of them are "free churches."

This change has been due largely to two causes, operating simultaneously. In the first it was a practical need. As soon as any rector and parish became touched by the impulse of social service, and began seriously the task of winning and serving the multitude, the question arose as to where to put them when they gathered them together. The pew holder, even if hospitably inclined, often found the guests whom the usher brought to the door of his pew not altogether to his taste. In any case the family idea associated with the pew was disturbed and irritated when strangers were habitually placed to sit between himself and his children. Beside that, the new people whom it was sought to bring in were apt to shy at the church door. They would come freely to a parish house or guild room, but they shrank instinctively from intruding in a pew, just as they would in a parlor.

And this coincided in time with the rise of that feeling which has now spread throughout society, and which in a vague way questions the right of individual ownership in any thing. It may seem a far cry from Henry George and Tolstoi to free churches; but the nexus is a very real one. The life of the world and the life of the Church are far more closely interblended than is generally realized.

The New Social Conscience. Whenever a new fashion of thought or emotion comes to prevail in the one it shows itself in the action of the other. Whether the free church policy has been for help or hindrance is not for the historian to decide. The present facts show that the oldest and strongest parishes, chiefly in the East and South, still maintain the old system of pew rental, that their hospitality to strangers has been immensely increased, that they appear to be quite as well filled as are the free churches, and that from them comes almost the whole of the gifts which support missions and also a large proportion of the free churches.

On the other hand, by means of free churches closer touch has been attained with strata of society which would not otherwise have been reached. In any case sober reflection would show that the one method is as legitimate as the other, that no question of principle is really involved, and that practical expediency will in the long run determine whether either of these methods, or some other, will be best for the Church.

The newly aroused social conscience of the Church early found itself confronted with the question of Marriage and Divorce. Marriage and Divorce. Within the period before us she has felt much, and thought somewhat, upon this perplexing subject.

Among all the changes occurring within the last amazing half century, none is more significant than that in the conception of the relation of man and woman in society. This has showed itself preëminently in the slow but steady loosening of the marriage bond. This phenomenon is manifest in a large part of the Christian world. In France, where divorce was theoretically impossible, it has become comparatively common. In England, where it was practically impossible, it has become easy. But it is in the United States that the movement has shown itself in its most rampant form. The increasing multiplicity of divorce was already occupying the attention of economists, jurists, and sociologists when the Church first seriously essayed to deal with it. Therefore there had been no specific law or canon dealing with the subject. The fundamental law of the Prayer-Book rubric which empowers the priest to repel from the Holy Communion "all notorious evil livers" had been deemed sufficient. This discipline was presently decided to be inadequate, and a canon was enacted forbidding the Minister to marry any man or woman who had been divorced from a partner still alive, "except the innocent party in the case of divorce for the cause of adultery." According to the spirit of the Church's immemorial discipline it was left to the priest to discover and pass judgment upon the facts in any such case, subject to an appeal to the Ordinary by any man or woman who felt aggrieved by his decision. But as the matter more and more engrossed the attention of the Church, the regulation of the Minister became increasingly rigorous. Instead of leaving the appeal to the offended man or woman the Minister was commanded to refer each such application for marriage to the Bishop at once for his godly judgment thereupon.

Then it was enacted still further that not even the alleged "innocent party" should be remarried by any Minister of this Church until, first, a year had elapsed from the divorce, second, that "evidence touching the facts in the case, including, if practicable, a copy of the Court's Decree and Record, be laid before the Ecclesiastical Authority," third, "that the said Ecclesiastical Court take legal advice thereupon, and declare in writing that the applicant is really the innocent party." Finally it is enacted that the Minister may in his discretion refuse to marry any divorced person whatever if he does not want to.

Up to this point, in so far as the Church's legislation is concerned, it was all plain sailing. It came within the province of Clerical Discipline, and there was no gainsaying it. But when it came to the discipline of the laity the case took on another complexion. It was an indefeasible right of the layman that he could not be excommunicated for any cause except "notorious evil living." But Marriage and Divorce is both a civil and an ecclesiastical cause. Can a man or woman be pronounced by the Church "a notorious evil liver" for an act which the State warrants, and to which it has been a party? The failure to realize this fundamental difficulty probably explains the failure of the Church to reach a satisfactory judgment in the matter. Here, as not infrequently, the General Convention assumed the possession of power to "bind and loose" without considering that the individual citizen in the Kingdom has rights which cannot be safely ignored. When the English State made it lawful, as it had previously been unlawful, for a man to marry his deceased wife's sister, the English Church's Minister was forbidden to excommunicate him for doing so. Until some way is found to adjust the diverse moralities of the Church and the State no permanent legislation upon this subject is likely to be reached by either. But the evil, which both in different degrees recognize, is so menacing that one may well believe that he who writes the history of the Church fifty years hence will record its abatement.

Rights of the Laity.

No problem of the Church has been more perplexing than that of the Negroes. At the close of the Civil

The Church
and the Negro.

War there were in the country about four millions of them. Since then they have multiplied to about eleven millions,—about one-ninth of the population. They are racially a “religious” people, but with a religion of the emotions and the imagination rather than of conduct. Before the War they were generally accounted members of some church, usually the one to which their master was attached. In the Northern cities there were perhaps half a dozen parishes composed almost exclusively of mulattoes. The ordinary Negro was seldom seen in these churches, and was scarcely welcomed,—for there are many “color lines” beside the one which divides white from black. But the great mass of them were adrift as sheep without a shepherd.

The Church was anxious to shepherd them, but did not know how. The sane and natural policy would have been to deal with them as a peculiar race, different from the mass of the population. By nature and tradition English Christianity was foreign and largely unintelligible to them. Its order, liturgy, hymns, and temper were alien to them. If they were to be reached effectively these facts were to be recognized. Such a policy was indeed urged by some of the most sagacious and statesmanlike men in the Church. The great Bishop Whittingham of Maryland proposed a well digested plan. It was substantially based upon the same principle to which Booker Washington has so tenaciously adhered. Its virtue was that it looked at facts as they were. He proposed, in substance, that a Bishop should be consecrated and set apart for the race, that he should be confined to no territorial boundaries, that within wide limits he should be left a free hand as to ritual, discipline, and methods. It was believed that thus could be formed a large African Episcopal Church, linked for the time being to the Church through its Bishop. The Negroes were all at sea ecclesiastically. They needed of all things those which the Church could furnish, the order and restraint of the Church's spirit. But they needed these things fitted to their own idiosyncrasies of nature and disposition.

But doctrinaires and sentimentalists would have none of it. Such ill applied phrases as "all are equal in Christ," "no color line in the Church," carried the day. Instead, the attempt was undertaken to make Episcopalian Negroes. Wherever the attempt has been successful in any considerable way it has brought its own embarrassments. In Northern dioceses where colored parishes were so few as to be negligible it passed unnoticed. The two races there lived habitually so separate and untouched by each other that no question of color arose. But in the dioceses of the South, where the Negroes are, the difficulty was insuperable. In many places the colored population equalled, and in some exceeded, the white. But between the two peoples a social chasm yawned which could not be bridged or passed. The fond notion still obtained that, in State and Church alike, citizenship had no essential relation with social status, that men could stand upon the same level as citizens, while in every thing else each gave his fealty to his own class.

It soon became clear that the theory would not work in the State, and its embarrassment soon appeared in the Church. If the colored people were gathered in any large numbers, and organized into parishes, would these parishes be received into union with the diocesan convention? If so, how long before their votes would preponderate? If not, with what face invite them to the Church? It did not take long for the colored family to discover that they were not wanted in the ecclesiastical family any more than they were in the social family. Unlike Booker Washington's appeal, that of the Church did not reach to their race consciousness and respect. Temporary expedients in the way of "Colored Convocations" within the diocese were tried, but with scant success. The General Convention persistently boggled at the suggestion of a separate organization on the basis of race. When it finally became clear that no real progress was being made, a final makeshift was tried in the form of Suffragan Bishops, with special view to special work among the Negroes. This plan really acknowledged the principle of race segregation, but proposed to confine its operation within the diocese. The plan was disingenuous and the offspring of timidity. It failed entirely of the purpose for which it was ostensibly devised. No Suffragan has thus far been appointed in the South, but on the other hand the nondescript official has begun to multiply in the North,—where the Negroes are not. The net result of fifty years' deliberation and work has been a practical failure to make any considerable impression upon the colored mass. A few colored congregations gathered from the most forward of the race, and with preponderatingly white blood in their veins, live unobtrusively in the Church, but they are a negligible percentage of the eleven millions. The failure has not been due to lack of good will or earnest purpose, but to that ineradicable habit of this Church to be governed by sentiment instead of reality.

During the same period repeated attempts have been made to have the Church's legal title changed from "Protestant Episcopal" to something else. Change of Name. The motive of the agitation was to get rid of the adjective "Protestant." It was urged that the word was both superfluous and misleading, that the true status of the Church is not that of protest but of secure assertion, that the day of protest is long past, that the title is an embarrassment and offense in any possible rapprochement with the Catholic branches of the historic Church, that it tacitly aligns this Church with a system of doctrine and a manner of ecclesiastical life which are not really hers.

NASHOTAH—IN EARLY DAYS

THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL.

On the other hand it is urged that the name has been an honored possession for a century and a quarter, that the Church is far closer akin to the Protestant than to the Catholic side of Christianity, that to drop the name or change it would be to estrange us hopelessly from that portion of the Christian world which is nearest us, that the proposed change of name really imports a change of the thing to something else which to many is abhorrent. The agitation has waxed and waned, but upon the whole has gained ground. Its mere discussion has kept the idea before the Church, so that the strangeness of the proposition has largely worn away. From being regarded as "a monster of hideous mien" it has passed through the phases of pity and endurance, and may finally be embraced.

For a good while the Church has been concerned with two radical changes in her organization, one adopted Provincial System. and the other strongly urged, the "Provincial System," and "Proportionate Representation." From the organization of the Church up to 1913 the governing and legislative body was the General Convention, constituted by representations from each diocese. Between this general assembly and the diocese there was no intermediate council or court. But the growth of the Church, the multiplication of her interests, the extension into so many and so sundered missionary fields, at last brought to the General Convention such a mass of agenda that it became overburdened. Therefore in 1913 a set of intermediate parliaments was created. To these Provincial Councils is to be referred a mass of causes in the first instance, and a class of work which heretofore has occupied the General Convention itself.

In the proportion in which each diocese is represented in the General Convention a strange solecism has existed from the beginning. Regardless of the respective size or numbers of the constituent dioceses each one has the same number of representatives and the same vote. When the Constitution was originally adopted every diocese was conterminous with a State. Indeed it regarded itself as an independent State Church. As it was in the case of the Federal Constitution, the only terms upon which each State would enter into the general government was that of absolute equality with every other one. In forming the United States this reluctance was overcome by allowing equal representation in the Senate with a proportionate representation in the House.

But the dioceses in the several States refused to come into union except upon harder terms. So long as each diocese remained conterminous with a State, and while the idea of state autonomy remained powerful, the absurdity of the system was little noticed. But after the Civil War, when the State Rights idea began to decline, and when each State began to be divided into two or more dioceses, the inequitableness and the practical evils of the situation became more and more palpable. But it was difficult to correct. It is easier to grant powers than to recall them. It was but human nature, even Christian human nature, for the smaller dioceses to oppose the surrender of constitutional rights. Nevertheless the common sense and the innate justice of the Church presses more and more, making this the most vital matter concerning the present and the future of the Church.

Proportionate Representation.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE NET RESULT.

IN his "American Commonwealth" Mr. Bryce makes an interesting although cautious estimate of the religious life of the people of the United States. His judgment is that the diffused religiousness is more intense than that of the Continental peoples of Europe, probably about the same as that of England, and rather less than that of Scotland. But he points out that it has a quality of its own. It is Christian, of course, but it is American. It has a flavor, a tinge, a character different from the Christianity which exists elsewhere. It is not easy to say just wherein this peculiarity consists. Institutions, doctrines, rituals, are much the same as in the rest of the world, but the impression which it makes upon the observer is characteristic.

Is it possible to discover and discriminate the Church's influence in forming American Christianity as it now exists? Has she had any real effect, and if so, what? No task could be more difficult or delicate than the attempt to make such an estimate. The required information, the candor, and the skill are all alike hard to command. And yet no history of the Church can be deemed complete with this task left unattempted, for it is in this way rather than by the exhibition of statistics that the Church's present position is to be measured. The data are hard to obtain. Every considerable sect in the United States has had its history written, both by friends and enemies. But practically no attempt has been made to weigh the influence which each has had upon another or upon the life of the people as a whole. There are no authorities to be consulted in the attempt to traverse this untrodden ground. This historic fact itself is one sufficiently interesting to be recorded.

The religious life of the people of the United States has been derived through many sources. It may be likened to a broad moving river fed by affluents which stream into it from a hundred quarters. Of course when these tributaries merge into the broad stream they lose for the most part their distinctive colors. But this fusion was not effected at once. In some instances a tributary stream acts as does the Blue Nile in the great river of Egypt. It keeps its color and its especial density in the midst of the flood with which it moves. But all, sooner or later, merge themselves so entirely in the common current that only something like a chemical analysis will discover the several contributions.

It is to be remarked that the societies within which the people conduct their religious lives are almost without exception of foreign origin. Only two or three denominations calling themselves Churches can be named which originated in the United States. These are the "Christian," the Mormon, and the Reformed Episcopal. This country has not been prolific in sects. The tendency, though slow, has been, upon the whole, towards unification. No "Confessions of Faith" are of American manufacture. The only one which has exercised any considerable influence, the Cambridge Platform, has been well-nigh forgotten. The same might be said generally of the imported Articles and Confessions, also, so far as their actual influence upon the religious life of the people is concerned.

In order to estimate the influence of the Church a brief historical survey will be necessary. It is difficult to realize that almost two-thirds of the history of the people of the United States lies anterior to the Revolutionary War. The events which have occurred since that date have been so striking and have moved in such rapid sequence, that they throw into the background the colonial period. Nevertheless, it is within that period that one must seek the causes which to-day show their results in many important areas of life.

In regard of their every-day habits of religious thought and action the early colonists may be roughly classed in three groups—the Southern, the Eastern, and the Middle Colonies. These people were more alike religiously than is often assumed, but they had also certain different tendencies, which made them draw quickly apart. To begin with, they were all alike Church of England people. That foundation of unconscious habit and custom upon which all conscious belief rests was that which had been slowly laid during the preceding centuries of Christian England. And habit has to do quite as much as volition with every-day religion. One assumption which was fixed in the very structure of their thought was the union of Church and State.

They were all alike in this. Our assumption of the normal separateness of Church and State was not even thinkable by them. But the groups differed from each other in the distribution of emphasis which they laid upon religious and civil institutions. In Virginia and Maryland they conceived of the Church as a department of State. The civil side was uppermost in their thought when they came here, just as it had been uppermost while they abode in Old England. The ideal of a Virginia parish was to reproduce the life of a Devonshire parish. Priest and people came out together, and the squire was a more considerable person than the parson here, as he had been there. They thought to organize a new society whose predicate was State, and of which the term Christian was but a descriptive epithet. Organized society was a personality which had both secular and spiritual relations, but they believed that its life was best and most safely conducted from the secular side. The Church was subordinated to the State.

The New England colonists were Church of England people also. That little group of Independents who landed at Plymouth had but little influence in affairs. Their experiment was soon concluded. Their ideal was not to be realized until more than two centuries should have elapsed. The Puritans were members of the Church of England. Their early Clergy were Episcopally ordained. Their enterprise set out with the benediction of the bishop. They also conceived of Church and State as one. The modern idea of the Church as a voluntary association, having its life in the midst of a State with which it has no official connection, was inconceivable to them, and would have been abhorrent if it had been suggested. They were the highest of high Churchmen. The Southern Colonist had in mind to found a State which should contain a Church, the Northern had in mind to found a Church which should include a State.

The third group, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, were dominated by a different motive. They included a far smaller proportion of pure English stock. The Scotch, Dutch, and Germans brought with them a different set of prepossessions. The idea of the separateness of Church and State had emerged much more clearly in their minds while they dwelt in their old homes. They had not thought out very clearly any theory concerning the matter, but they proceeded to settle the great question of the Reformation by actual practice. They set up secular courts to secure secular rights, and allowed the people to group themselves spiritually as their several affinities might lead.

The above was, in general, the ecclesiastical situation at the middle of the eighteenth century. So far as doctrinal beliefs were concerned, the people of the Colonies, whether English, Dutch, Scotch, or German, were what would now be called Calvinistic, but which is really Augustinian. With the exception of the Quakers, whom the possession of the "Inner Light" rendered indifferent to all doctrine, they believed in the Fall; the Incarnation of God in Christ; the expiatory quality of Christ's life and death; in a sharp distinction between the "saved" and the "lost"; in a materially pictured heaven and hell; in the literal inspiration of the Bible; and took for granted the causal relation between religion and conduct. They were generally agreed in their dislike of what they called "enthusiasm." They condemned and feared the appeal to the emotions in religion. This was as true of the Puritan of Massachusetts and the Presbyterian of Pennsylvania as it was of the High Churchman of Connecticut or the Latitudinarian of Virginia. The tradition of the extravagancies of the Anabaptists and the Fifth Monarchy men was still vivid. The Quaker, the Baptist, and the Mennonite were looked at askance by the great mass of the population.

These were, in the main, the characteristics of the primary stratum of American religious life. It was deposited but slowly, and the various portions were so separated from each other in the spaciousness of a new country that their influence upon each other was but slight.

Each denomination long retained the peculiarities it brought with it. A few retain them yet. There are certain small bodies, as, for example, the Reformed Presbyterian, which remain almost uninfluenced by the religious movement in America. Indeed, one, the largest of all, the Roman Church, may be left out of consideration in any attempt to estimate the reciprocal effect of the various portions upon each other. While it is true that the Roman Church has been profoundly affected by the religious and political atmosphere of America, so that Romanism here is easily distinguished from Romanism elsewhere in the world, still it moves apart from the main current. "Romanism and Protestantism are not, as it is so generally assumed, varieties of the same religion; they are different religions."¹

The Romanist lives his religious life apart from his Protestant neighbors, and they probably understand as little both its virtues and its faults as he does theirs.

But the first religious problem which confronted the people of this country was one in which all alike were concerned. That was to delimit Church and State. For the first time since Constantine, was offered both the opportunity and the necessity for its solution. Only in New York and Rhode Island was this adjustment reached before the War of Independence, and in these Colonies not completely. It is not complete yet in the United States as a whole. There are still undetermined frontiers.² The causes of marriage and divorce and the field of public education are still regions where the adjustment of the religious and secular is far from complete.

But in this apportionment of the concerns of life between God and Cæsar, the Episcopal Church was before all others. This was a necessity of the situation. During the Colonial Period she had been far more closely bound to the civil power than had any other. The Revolutionary War tore her loose by violence and completely. The "Standing Order" of Congregationalism in Massachusetts and Connecticut could leisurely adjust itself to the new political life during sixty years. But the Church in Maryland and Virginia had to do it at once. Politically it was an outcast in the new Republic. This drove it to organize at once as a national Church for sheer self-preservation. It was the first to do so.¹ Ever since it has held itself aloof from politics. The lesson it learned during the eighteenth century has never been forgotten. Even during the passionate period of the Civil War men could go to Church in confidence that they would hear no echo of party strife either in prayers or sermon. Sooner or later all the denominations followed in the movement. It came to be natural that a Church should be a free, voluntary organization, living its life according to its own rules, in the midst of a State from which it asked nothing but to be safeguarded against encroachment.

¹ R. H. Hutton : Essays.

² For example, in one State Roman Catholics are still ineligible for office ; in several others infidels, atheists, and blasphemers are liable to be disfranchised.

But when the voluntary system began to be universally accepted the free religious atoms began to move into groups according to their natural affinities. As a result of this new grouping, the Church began to find her own place and to show her own qualities. The diffused Protestantism of the United States has crystallized about three separate points. These are the intellect, the emotions, the conscience. About the first of these were ranged the whole Presbyterian group, the Congregationalists, the Lutherans, and later the Unitarians. The note of this class is that it conceives of religion as primarily a matter of intellectual consent.

¹ The Presbyterian General Assembly was constituted the same year, 1789, but it included only a portion of the great Presbyterian family. Briggs: American Presbyterianism, p. 362.

They ask, "What do you believe?" They stickle for precision of theological statement. They make orthodoxy the condition of admission for the inquirer and for intercommunion among denominations. They possess "Confessions of Faith" and "Platforms." They value learning and honor doctors of Theology. They are coherent, logical, learned. In a word, their religion finds its home in the understanding rather than in the affections or the conscience. This is not to say that in the lives of their individuals they are hard in heart or loose in morals. But it is to say that when they seek for a ground upon which to effect outward and visible organization they look for that ground in doctrine rather than in either feeling or living.

The second group draws together upon the ground of the emotions. The Baptists, Methodists, "Christians," the Salvation Army, the Revivalists all hold the same conception of religion. They ask not, "What do you believe?" but "How do you feel?" The condition of membership for the individual is that he shall have passed through a definite sequence of emotions. The individuals are fused together in a denomination by the emotional fire through which they have all been passed. They lay comparatively little emphasis upon learning or logic because they have no need to do so. Their appeal is not, in the last resort, to the understanding, but to the heart. They have grown apace. Their strength is to win the great multitude which can be far more easily moved by the contagion of a divine impulse than it can be led to have a right understanding or to righteousness of life. Nor, once again, may it be said that this group is unmindful of either orthodoxy or morality in the individual. It is enough to say that as visible bodies they organize themselves about the emotional element in human nature.

The third group is composed of the Church, the Moravians, and, as being in spiritual sympathy with them, the Dutch Reformed, the Reformed Presbyterian, and a few other small and inconspicuous bodies. All these, while living apart, and in many cases little known by one another, have one fundamental note in common. They think of Christ's Church not as an organization for the maintenance of doctrine, nor for the contagiousness of religious feeling, but as an Institute of Righteousness. They are substantially at one in their conception of what Christianity essentially is. The question they address to the postulant is not "What do you believe?" nor "What do you feel?" but "How will you live?" The characteristic feature of the Church is her attitude toward the world. To this attitude the Church in England and the Church in America have adhered tenaciously, even at times when powerful influences both from without and within have tempted her to change it. In England her position has been reviled as Erastianism, and in America as worldliness, but she has held fast to it. She has remembered her Lord's caution, that His disciples must not expect to be taken out of the world, but only to be kept from evil. She regards the Church as an institution which has primary regard to the life that now is. She thinks of it much as she does of the State. It is intended for all men, good and bad alike. Its purpose is to produce and conserve goodness. Its dominant tone is ethical rather than either intellectual or emotional. It has often been taunted with "lack of vital piety," with worldliness, with cold morality. Dogmatists and emotionalists from within have attempted to transform her genius, but have not succeeded. Her abiding instinct has kept her steadfast to her conception of the Church as an "Institute of Righteousness." This has determined her position towards Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship, and fixed her conditions of membership and intercommunion. Her only test of the truth and value of doctrine is its immediate effect upon living. Sermons are practical and ethical rather than doctrinal or inspiring. Her Liturgy is valued and insisted upon not chiefly for its beauty or its antiquity, or its fitness to express exalted emotions, but because of its disciplinary power to uphold the soul in right living. For admission to membership she exacts only the minimum of belief. The general and unrelated articles of the Apostles' Creed are enough for a working Consensus. This, as expanded in the Nicene Creed, she pronounces to be "a sufficient statement of Christian Doctrine." That word "sufficient" in its connection has wide implications. It at once relegates all other statements of doctrine to the region of individual opinion. Thus far no other Church has ventured so bold a statement. That this is the position of the Church is seen by a crucial test of practice. The only condition on which she will turn the Key of the Kingdom of Heaven to bind or loose is an ethical condition. She bids to the Holy Sacrament all those who "do earnestly repent them of their sins and are in love and charity with their neighbors, and intend to lead a new life, walking in the commandments of God"; she repels only those who are known to be "open and notorious evil livers, or to have done any wrong to their neighbors by word or deed." This conception of the Church's place and function in the world is the key to a right understanding of her whole history. She attaches an importance to sacraments, ordinances, ritual, and organization which those outside not seldom characterize as formalism, superstition, bigotry. The charge would lie if these things were valued for themselves or if they were arbitrarily created. But, in fact, they have their rationale in the Church's deep sense of the difficulty of right living. Righteousness is at once a thing so arduous and of such transcendent value that any machinery which has proven its value to induce or maintain it becomes sacred and obligatory. And because the antithesis of holiness is selfishness, therefore the Church sets her seal of condemnation upon individualism in the sphere of religion. Like Israel, she accounts that régime in which "every man does that which is right in his own eyes" as the worst possible. Because membership in the spiritual society is of divine obligation, she feels bound to leave the conditions of membership so simple and easy that every man may be able to fulfil the obligation.

At this point it becomes of interest to ask, To what extent, and by what means, has she been able to impress her thought concerning the Church upon the people of this land?

That the whole trend of the present time is toward her view is evident to any competent observer. It does not follow that the movement is toward her. Dogmatic religion is already moribund. Emotional religion, while popularly strong, has come to be distrusted by the judicious, and shows symptoms of suspecting itself. The age is ethical. Character is coming to take the place of both experience and creed, both as the condition of membership in Church and as the real exponent of Christianity. The instinct of organization is also astir. The Church as a machinery for producing righteousness in a neighborhood has come to be the accepted thought. Fifty years ago this idea was hardly anywhere to be found. The movement generally toward a better church architecture, and a more formal and reverent liturgy, is an approach toward the Church's position. How much of this is due to the Church's direct influence is not easy to determine. Much of it simply manifests the operation of the spirit of truth, of which the Church holds no monopoly. But her organized presence in the land for a century has not been without direct result. While she has not been prolific of great theologians, and while the tone of her advocates and of her peculiar appeals may possibly have repelled more than they have attracted, nevertheless she has been for a century before the people a steadfast illustration of her idea of what the Church of Christ essentially is. Men have learned of her even while they disliked her; they have heard while they struck.

Her influence, moreover, has been immeasurably enhanced by her relationship to the Church of England.

This has operated both directly and indirectly. The most powerful ecclesiastical organization of the world's dominant race has insensibly shared her prestige with the Church in the United States. The sense of relationship with the Mother Church has made her bold when she would otherwise have been deprecatory, and confident when she would have been timid. It has had its drawbacks, but they have been far more than counterbalanced by its advantages. If it has caused a curate here and there to affect a mediæval English accent or a feeble-minded bishop to break out into cockade and knee breeches, it has, on the other hand, tended to give a Church which is the sixth in rank, judged by its numbers, a place among the foremost in point of influence. The English connection has operated even more powerfully indirectly. The higher literature read in America is predominantly of English origin, and its unconscious background is the English Church. Shakespeare takes the Church for granted. Scott leaves his every reader in friendly spirit toward her. Tennyson and Browning are tinged by her local color. English fiction, with whatever motive it be written, incidentally makes its readers familiar with her manners, thoughts, service, and spirit. The theology which is read by the clergy of every denomination in America is English, as is also their Biblical history and criticism. "The Life of Christ" by Farrar and by Edersheim is in every hand. Although none of these are written in the spirit of an advocate or with the thought of propagandism, still the fundamental conception of the Church of Christ for which Episcopacy stands underlies them all and makes itself felt through all. The writings of the late Bishop Phillips Brooks have operated powerfully in the same direction. They have passed into the hands of tens of thousands outside the Church, and have opened to them the same thought of what the religion of Christ essentially is which unconsciously controlled him and which he imbibed from the Church in which he was born. This diffused and inarticulate predisposition toward the Church has been taken advantage of and been forcefully presented by a host of more churchly men who have been instant in season and out of season to advance her interests and extend her visible frontier. The net result has come that the Church has steadily grown by natural increase; has received many who have been drawn to her by various motives; has lost few; has remained hospitable at heart if not always in manner; and stands today, in the general respect and good will of the people, for freedom in truth, order in worship, and righteousness in life.

INDEX.

- ABOLITIONISTS, the Church and, 363.
Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy, 8, 26; effects of, 11, 26, 32; in Maryland, 106; in Scotland, 155.
Adams, John, on the Establishment, 185; on the Episcopate, 251.
Advancement Society, 293.
Alabama, 328; secession of, 369, 371, 375, 377.
America, condition of, in 1600, 5 et seq.; in 1700, 86 et seq., 95, 98; in 1800, 277; modern, 292.
American Church, 130; effects of revivalism upon, 144; need of an Episcopate, 173-189; three motives of reconstruction, 217; efforts toward organization, 220 et seq., 238; structural development, 264.
Americanism, 121, 335.
Amusements, 159.
Anabaptists, 39, 72.
Andros, Gov., 44; in New York, 63; opposition to William and Mary College, 115.
Anglo-Catholics, 337, 339.
Anne, Queen, 31, 125, 148.
Antrim evictions, 156.
Architecture, 199, 329.
Arkansas, 359, 369, 371, 376.
Articles, the Thirty-nine, 274, 331.
Asbury, Mr., 290, 313.
Assembly, Colonial, acts of, 21, 23, 84; established the Church in New York, 64; hostile legislation of, 110, 122; proposition to, 117.
Atkinson, Bishop, 370, 377.
"Awakening, the Great," 136 et seq., 170; and the Evangelical movement, 318.
BACON, EPHRAIM, 321.
Baltimore, Lord, 48, 49, 51.
Baptists, relations with the Indians, 20; among the Puritans, 35, 41; in New York, 63; doctrine of the "Inner Light," 72; numbers in Maryland in 1703, 105; in North Carolina, 124; on the Memorial of 1853, 354; attitude toward slave question, 360.
Bass, Dr., 259.
Bedell, Dr., 318.
Benade, Bishop, 341.
Berkeley, Dean, 133.
Binney, Horace, 378.
Bishop, see Episcopate; Methodist, 171.
Bishop of London, 23, 47, 66, 92, 96, 117, 194; Compton, 97, 175, 177; powers of, 109, 115, 121, 175, 192; Gibson, 110; Lowth, 170, 229; Tenison, 177, 179.
Blair, Commissary, 89; in Virginia, 112; efforts for William and Mary College, 113; see Commissaries.
Blaxton, William, 39.
Böhler, Peter, 152; influence on Wesley, 164.
Book Annexed, 407.
Boston, parish organized, 43; see Massachusetts.

- Boucher, Dr., 111.
 Bowman, Dr., 353.
 Boyd, 318.
 Bray, Commissary, 89, 90, 96, 111 ;
 visit to America, 97 ; his memorial, 98 ; in Maryland, 105 ; see Commissaries.
 Breck, 323.
 Bristed, 318.
 Bristol College, 327.
 Brown Brothers, the, 38.
 Bull, 318.
 Burgess, Bishop, 350, 352.
 Burlington, N. J., 179, 191 ; convention in 1765, 178.
 Butler, Gen., as a canonist, 372.
- CALIFORNIA, 357, 358.
 Calvert, Lord Baltimore, 48, 49, 51.
 Calvinism, in Scotland, 153 ; and the Evangelicals, 316 ; in the Church, 330.
 Carolinas, the, 82 ; the Church there, 84, 124, 125, 293 ; conditions in 1820, 296 ; Bishop Ravenscroft, 320 ; secession, 329.
 Catholic, 332, 338 ; renaissance, 324 ;
 nature of the Church, 342, 350.
 Centralization, 324 et seq., 329, 338, 366.
 Chandler, Dr., 184, 186, 227.
 Charles I., 31 ; loyalty to, in Virginia, 112 ; in Scotland, 233.
 Charleston, 83, 84.
 Charter withdrawn from Massachusetts, 42 ; from Maryland, 55.
 Chase, Bishop, 293, 301, 305, 318.
 Cheney, Rev. Charles E., 397.
 Christ Church, Philadelphia, 81 ;
 Savannah, 162.
 Church, the, effect of Act of Uniformity upon, 11, 12, 26, 32 ; in Raleigh's colony, 14, 112 ; in Gorges' colony, 15, 94 ; first in America, 17 ; relations with Indians, 20 ; lack of sympathy from colonists, 20 ; legislation in regard to, 21, 94, 106, 110 ; relaxation of laws and manners, 24, 136 ; condition in 1700, 25, 57,
 86, 95, 98 ; relation to State, see
 Church and State ; temper of, 32,
 172 ; in New England, 35 et seq.,
 94, 127, 185 ; in Maryland, 54, 58,
 105 ; in New York, 63, 93, 284 ;
 attitude of Quakers toward, 74, 78 ; in Pennsylvania, 80, 102 ; in the Carolinas, 83, 124 ; conflict with vestries, 92, 93 ; S. P. G., 96, 98, 103 ; buildings, 102 ; work of Keith and Talbot, 101, 103 ; the Commissaries, 105, 112 ; attempt to reform manners, 107, 117 ; apathy to educational interests, 113, 114 ; devoted men in, 120, 342 ; in Connecticut, 132, 289 ; attitude toward revivalism,
 140, 142, 145 ; theory of religion,
 138, 144 ; secret of growth, 146,
 172 ; influence of the Scotch, 157,
 159 ; mistaken policy, 12, 158,
 170 ; relation to Methodism, 160 et seq., 169, 172, 290 ; theories of, see Theories ; condition before the Revolution, 190 ; growth of, 191, 193, 342, 354 ; services, 200 ; Tories in, 204 ; attitude toward the Revolution, 205 et seq. ; after the Revolution, 217, 219 ; three motives in reorganization of, 217 ; property, 219, 221, 222 ; organizing and naming, 220, 223 ; the federal idea in, see Federal ; fundamental principles (1784), 239 ; Constitution of, 240 et seq. ;
 structural development of, 264,
 310 ; State autonomy, 273, 297,
 300, 309 ; French influence, 280 ;
 condition in the South, 286 ; in 1820, 295, 297, 311 ; among the pioneers, 298 ; national quality of, see National ; propagandism, 309, 310, 326 ; "High" and "Low," 315, 316, 320 ; movement West, 322, 357 ; two ideals

- of, 323; centralization, 324, 356; the Church idea, 326, 328, 329, 343, 381; as a sect, 342, 343, 348; Unity, 421, see Unity; attitude toward slavery, 361; in the Confederacy, 369; reunited, 374, 379; new problems, 379, 380; influence, 444; and doctrine, 454.
- Church and State; churchman's theory of, 27; Puritan theory of, 26, 27, 31; Romanist theory of, 26, 27; Pilgrims' theory of, 28; English theory of, 30, 93; alliance between, 31, 42, 93, 110, 126, 160, 180, 209; conflict between, 109, 117, 121, 123, 185, 189; at the Revolution, 205 et seq.; after the Revolution, 215; at the Civil War, 365, 366, 368.
- Civil War, effects of, 379, 380.
- Claggett, Dr., 281, 286.
- Clayton, Rev. Thomas, 81.
- Clergy, character of, 18, 21, 56, 57, 111, 113, 115, 120, 342; dress of, 87, 199, 285, 328; social status of, 88, 91; manners of, 89, 90, 107; lack of equipment, 96, 113; conflict with the people, 109, 121; discipline of, 115, 117, 119; support of, see Support; numbers of, 195; not called priests, 201; position at the Revolution, 205; sufferings of, 209; in 1800, 311.
- Clerk, the, 87, 200.
- Cobbs, Bishop, 370.
- Coke, Dr., 290.
- Colonial, legislation, see Assembly and Legislation; Church theology, 432.
- Colonies, Raleigh's, 14; Gorges', 15, 36, 94; Virginia, 16, 112; Massachusetts, 29; Maryland, 49; New York, 59; Swedes on the Delaware, 69; Friends in New Jersey, 75; Penn's, 79; South Carolina, 83; Georgia, 124, 162; legal status of, 184.
- Commissaries, in Maryland, 105; in Virginia, 112; see Bray and Blair; in Northern colonies, 126.
- Commonwealth and the Church, 24, 176; in Virginia, 112.
- Confederate Church, 369 et seq.
- Confirmation, 200, 282.
- Congregationalists, on the Memorial (1853), 354.
- Connecticut, the Church in, 36, 132, 191; first convention, 225; ecclesiasticism, 238, 240, 254; in 1812, 289.
- Constitution, of Church, 242, 258; discussion of, 261; change in the spirit of, 309, 310, 324.
- Convention in 1783, 221; Constitutional (1785), 240; in 1786, 252; in 1789, 259; in 1792, 299; powers of, 265, 268, 272, 309, 367; in 1812, 288; in 1844, 339; in 1853, 358; in 1862, 367; Confederate, 369, 370; 1865, 377; see General Convention.
- Conversion, J. Edwards's theory of, 138, 313; Wesley's, 165, 313; the principle, 169, 172, 313.
- Convocation, 107, 265.
- Corporation for the relief of widows and children of clergy, 201, 238.
- Coxe, Dr., 326, 353.
- Craik, Dr., 353.
- Creed, the Athanasian, 246, 249, 263; Nicene, 246, 253, 256; Apostles', 247, 253.
- Croswell, Dr., 326.
- Cummins, Bishop, 381, 400.
- Cutler, President of Yale, 127.
- DARE, VIRGINIA, 14.
- Dashiell, Daniel, 286.
- Davis, Bishop, 370.
- Declaration, concerning baptismal regeneration, 397; concerning ritual, 388.
- Deism, 166, 195, 248.
- De Koven, Rev. Dr. James, 392.
- De Lancey, 343.

- Delaware, 69; in 1820, 296.
- Diaconate, the, revival of, 349, 351, 352, 356.
- Diocesan autonomy, 274, 351; subdivision, 324.
- Discipline, 109; decline of, 117; difficulties of, 176; Bishop's powers of, 266, 267; of laity, 270; trial of Bishops, 325.
- Dissenters, 106, 125, 133; inclination toward the Church, 102, 178.
- Doane, Bishop, 326, 350, 351.
- Doddridge, Rev. Joseph, 298, 299.
- Dogma, 153; changes in Prayer-Book, 248; anti-dogmatic spirit, 248, 332; new methods and, 380.
- Duché, Dr., 286.
- Dutch, the, 59 et seq.; ecclesiastical position, 61; dealings with Puritans, 61; toleration, 62; attitude toward the Church, 63, 102, 193.
- EASTERN CHURCH, 411.
- Ecclesiasticism in New England, 238, 254, 255; and the federal idea, 240; increasing, 325; and the Oxford movement, 340.
- Education, 96, 97, 198, 294; opposition to, in Virginia, 114; Dean Berkeley and, 133; academies and seminaries, 293; Bishop Otey in Mississippi, 309; Bishop Chase in Ohio, 305.
- Edwards, Jonathan, 136; theory of conversion, 138; influence of, on American Church, 138, 329; relation to Wesley, 170.
- Elizabeth, Queen, 48.
- Elliott, Bishop, 365, 366, 369, 374.
- Emigration to America, occasions of, 8, 23; conditions for, 18; from Germany, 147; Scotch-Irish, 156; to West and South, 301, 357.
- Endicott, John, 37.
- England, condition of, in 1600, 9; at the Reformation, 153; in 1750, 165; feeling toward American Church, 229; in 1825, 330.
- English, theory of the Church, 30; ignorance of American affairs, 180; Church ceased to exist in America, 209, 217.
- Episcopacy, 128, 336; and Presbyterianism, 154; and Methodism, 170.
- Episcopate, the, 173, 250, 348; plans for American, 65, 110, 176, 178, 179; need of, 108, 116, 176, 194; reasons of failure, 180; current conception of, 181; opposition to, 182, 229; impossible till after the Revolution, 187; "Independent," 187; Dr. Seabury and the Connecticut plan, 227; resort to Scotland, 231; in the Middle States, 250; the two lines of, 254; English succession, 260, 281.
- Establishment, the, in Massachusetts and New York by English law, 42, 93, 94, 185; in Maryland, 55; unpopular, 57, 186, 217; by the Assembly, 64, 106; in South Carolina, 84, 125.
- "Evangelical Episcopal Church," 287.
- Evangelicals, the, 145, 311; compared with Methodists, 312; differentiate of, 313; theory of Church, 315; function of, 312, 316; cause of decline of, 316; in 1853, 317; leaders of, 318; Knowledge Society, 320, 338.
- Evans, Evan, 95.
- Evans, H. D., 338.
- Evolution, doctrine of, 380.
- FACKLER, ST. M., 358.
- Federal Idea, the, 236, 264, 273, 297, 300, 306, 356, 366; and the ecclesiastical idea, 240, 281; revolutionary character of, 265; new departure, 309, 310, 324.
- Fletcher, Gov., 64.

- Flushing Institute, 327.
 Fourth of July Office, 247, 263.
 Fox, George, 71, 75.
 Franklin, Benjamin, 131, 189, 205 ;
 influence of, 196.
 Freeman, Bishop, 353.
 Freeman, of King's Chapel, 248.
 French influence, 280, 288.
- GENERAL CONVENTION, powers of,
 270, 271, 272, 309, 367 ; in 1844, 339 ; memorial to (1853), 344 et seq. ; spirit of, 356 ; and the Confederates, 375.
- Georgia, 124 ; Wesley in, 162 ; secession, 369.
- Germans, 147 ; religious and social condition, 149 ; relations with the Church, 151.
- Gibson, Bishop, of London, 110.
 Gorges' Colony, 15, 36, 94.
 "Great Awakening," the, 136, 159, 329.
- Greek Church in Alaska, 358.
 Green, Bishop, 369.
 Gregg, Bishop, 370.
 Griffith, Dr., 253, 258, 281.
 Griswold, Bishop, 293, 318, 326.
- HAWKS, 326.
 Hayti, 381.
 Henry, Patrick, 120, 123, 287.
 Hervey, 313.
 Higginson, Rev. Francis, 29.
 High Churchmen, 316, 319, 321.
 Hobart, Bishop, 284, 286, 293, 294,
 318 ; churchmanship of, 319, 328, 335.
 "Holy Club," the, 161, 164, 312.
 Hook, Dean, 334, 336.
 Hopkins, Bishop, 318, 326, 368, 374, 375, 387.
 House of Bishops, see Episcopate.
 Huguenots, in New York, 62, 63 ; in Maryland, 105 ; in South Carolina, 125.
 Hunt, Rev. Robert, 16, 18, 113.
- Huntington, Rev. Dr. Wm. R., 406.
 Hymns, 200, 272.
- IMMIGRATION, of Germans, 147 ;
 checked, 151 ; of Scotch-Irish, 156.
 Independents, in England, 26 ; ready to conform, 178.
 "Independent Episcopal Church," 187, 224.
- Indians, the, character of, 6 ; attempts to convert, 7, 19, 113, 192, 293 ; first convert, 14 ; relations with churchmen, 20 ; with Penn., 77 ; with the Welsh, 82.
- Individualism, 329.
 Intidelity, 280, 288, 334.
 Ingham, 313.
 Inglis, Bishop, 208, 227.
 "Inner Light," doctrine of, 72, 76, 79.
- Italian Church reform, 412.
 Ives, Bishop, 340.
- JAMES I., 30, 48, 154.
 Jarratt, Devereux, 288.
 Jarvis, Dr., 256.
 Jefferson, 280, 281.
 Jesuits, missionaries, 5, 6 ; in Maryland, 50, 52.
 Jews, the, in New York, 62.
 Jones, Morgan, 82.
 Jubilee College, 305.
- KEBLE, 326, 331.
 Keith, George, Quaker, 79 ; missionary of S. P. G., 101, 103, 177.
 Kemp, Bishop, 286.
 Kemper, Bishop, 343, 351.
 Kentucky, 298, 301, 306 ; Church organized, 307.
 Kenyon College, 305.
 Kerfoot, Dr., 378, 379.
 King's Chapel, 46 ; Unitarianism of, 248.
 Kip, Bishop, 338, 358.
- LAKE, ARTHUR, Rt. Rev., 29.

- Laws, see Legislation.
- Lay, Bishop, 377.
- Laymen in Church councils, 242, 243, 255, 258, 261, 265, 266.
- Leaming, Jer., 227.
- Lee, 120, 287.
- Legal status of the colonies, 184 : of the Church, 123, 185.
- Legislation, concerning religion, in Virginia, 21 ; Puritan, 22, 34 ; spirit of, 22 ; English laws and colonial, 94 ; in Maryland, 106 ; hostile to the Church, 110, 122.
- Liberalism, 332.
- Lincoln, President, 363, 369, 373.
- Liquor, production of, 279 ; question, 326, 363.
- Liturgy, control of, 271 ; compulsory use of, 348, 351, 352, 354 ; revision, 244, 261, 357, 381 ; Confederate, 371 ; science of, 406.
- Lockwood, Henry, 321.
- Louisiana (New Orleans), 293, 302 ; secession, 369.
- Low Churchmen, 284, 315, 320, 322.
- Lutherans, in New York, 62 ; Swedish, 69, 352 ; attitude toward the Church, 102, 152, 178, 194 ; in Maryland, 105 ; in Pennsylvania, 150.
- MADISON, BISHOP, 281, 290.
- Madison, President, 205.
- Manteo, 14.
- Marriages, performed only by clergy, 92, 107.
- Marshall, Samuel, 84.
- Martyn, Henry, 321.
- Maryland, colonized, 49 ; Protestant revolution, 53 ; Yeo's account of, 54 ; charter revoked, 55 ; in 1700, 57, 105 ; the Establishment, 106 ; reorganizing the Church, 220, 221 ; in 1820, 296.
- Massachusetts, 36, 41, 42, 94, 185.
- McIlvaine, Bishop, 318, 338, 368.
- Meade, Bishop, 288, 293, 326, 328 ; Evangelical, 318 ; on the Memorial of 1853, 352 ; on slavery, 364 ; secession, 365, 369, 370.
- Meeting-houses, joint use of, 44.
- Memorial, Dr. Bray's, 98 ; of 1853, 344 ; report of committee upon, 354 ; fatal choice, 355 ; task taken up, 381.
- Mennonites, 72, 76, 150.
- Methodists, 160 ; lost to the Church, 12, 171, 291 ; in Georgia, 124 ; relation to the Church, 160, 169, 170 ; origin, 161 ; purpose, 168 ; come to America, 170 ; bishops, 171 ; after the Revolution, 288 ; Dr. Coke's plan of union, 290 ; among the pioneers, 298, 307 ; Evangelicals and, 312, 318 ; ecclesiastical empire, 329 ; on the Memorial of 1853, 354 ; on slavery, 360.
- Mexico, Church in, 413.
- Mexican commission, 417.
- Miller, Chaplain, 65, 177.
- Minnesota, 323, 359.
- Missions, to Indians, 1, 7, 19 ; of the S. P. G., 90 ; new departure, 300, 309 ; foreign, 321 ; general, 327.
- Mississippi, 308, 328 ; secession, 369, 375.
- Missouri, 327.
- Moore, Bishop, 284, 318, 328.
- Moravians, 20, 152, 164 ; and the Church, 341, 353.
- Moravian Orders, 420.
- Morton, John, 36.
- Muhlenbergs, the, 151, 206, 326, 327, 343, 355, 357.
- NAME of the Church, 220.
- National Church, 11, 297, 299, 300, 309, 310, 318, 324.
- New England, first colony in, 29 ; Puritans, 26 et seq. ; planting the Church in, 35 ; "converts," 127, 256 ; condition just before the Revolution, 190 ; reorganization,

- 223; plan for the Episcopate, 223; ecclesiasticism of, 238, 240; after the Revolution, 289; in 1820, 295.
- New Jersey, 75; (Burlington), 178, 179, 191; in 1820, 296.
- Newman, 331; his purpose, 332; the outcome, 334, 337, 340.
- Newton, John, 313.
- New York, settled, 59; coming of English Church to, 63; Trinity Parish, 67, 95; in 1700, 95; just before the Revolution, 191; party strife, 284; in 1820, 295.
- Nicholson, Gov., 89, 115, 116, 179.
- Nitschman, Bishop, 152.
- Nonjurors, 232, 256.
- North Carolina, see Carolinas.
- OGLETHORPE'S settlement, 124, 161.
- Ohio, condition in 1820, 296, 298, 301; Phil. Chase, 302, 306, 323; Church organized, 303.
- Old South Meeting-House, 44.
- Old Swedes Churches, 70.
- Onderdonk, Bishop, 326, 327.
- Orders, the question of, 128, 130, 174, 345, 349, 351; Scotch, 233; relation of the three, 266.
- Ordination, difficulties of, 176; power of selection for, 268.
- Oregon, 358.
- Organization of the Church, two theories of, 173; in Maryland, 220; in Virginia, 222; in New England, 223; political obstacles, 226; in the Middle States, 238; fundamental principles, 239.
- Otey, Bishop, 307, 320, 343, 350, 365, 370.
- Oxford Movement, the, 329, 333 et seq.; results, 334, 340, 341.
- PACA, Gov., 221.
- Paine, Tom, 195, 280.
- Parker, Dr., 256, 258, 259, 293.
- "Parsons' Cause," the, 121.
- Partisan Church papers, 396.
- Penn, William, 76, 77.
- Pennsylvania, colonized, 77; first Church, 80; Christ Church, 81; in 1700, 95; Talbot's report, 102; University of, 131, 195; German immigration, 148; "Dutch," 149; in 1820, 296.
- Philadelphia, 69, 70, 79, 80, 81, 156; see Pennsylvania.
- Pilgrims, the, 28.
- Pocahontas, 19.
- Polk, Bishop, 343, 376; on the Memorial of 1853, 352; on slavery, 366, 369, 370.
- Porteus, Bishop, 317.
- Potter, Bishop Alonzo, 343, 350, 351, 357.
- Prayer-Book, imposed by law, 10; distasteful to Puritans, 37, 38, 94; scarcity of, 87; English book in use, 244; revision of, 244, 261, 262, 270, 311, 402; commission, 407.
- Presbyterians, lost to the Church, 12; with the Indians, 20; Dutch, 61, 62; in New York, 65; in the Carolinas, 84, 124; in Maryland, 110, 111; and revivalism, 140; in Scotland, 153; in America, 156; attitude toward the Church, 157; influence, 159; after the Revolution, 281; among the pioneers, 299; strife, 329; on the Memorial, 353; on slavery, 360.
- Promotion of Christian Knowledge, Society for, 97.
- Propagation of the Gospel, Society for, 96; see Society.
- Property, the Church's, 219, 221, 287, 295.
- "Proposed Book," the, 245; see Prayer-Book.
- "Protestant Catholics," 57.
- Protestant Episcopal Church, 220, 341, 342, 350.
- Protestantism, 174, 332.
- Provoost, Bishop, 207, 249, 253, 258, 284, 285.

- Puritans, 26, 136; lost to the Church, 12; attitude toward the Church, 16, 29, 36, 39, 94, 128, 132, 183; laws, 22, 34; theory, 31; temper, 32; and the Prayer-Book, 37, 38; joint use of meeting houses, 44; quarrel with, ended, 47; and the Dutch, 61, 62; influence upon the ministerial office, 91; relaxation of religious life, 136; and revivalism, 142, 143.
- QUADRILATERAL, the, 423.
- Quakers, lost to the Church, 12; attitude toward the Church, 23, 78, 102, 103, 193; with the Puritans, 35, 41; with the Dutch, 62; George Fox and the "Inner Light," 72; in New Jersey, 75; William Penn, 76; George Keith, 79; in Maryland, 105, 106.
- RANDOLPH, JOHN, 120.
- Ravenscroft, Bishop, 307, 320, 341.
- Redemptioners, 149, 197.
- Reformed Church, the, 150, 329; on the Memorial of 1853, 354.
- Reformed Episcopal Church, 355, 381, 400.
- Revision of the Prayer-Book, see Prayer-Book.
- Revolutionary War, 202.
- Richmond, William, 358.
- Riley, Bishop, 414, 419.
- Ritual, controversy, 382; commission, 390.
- Ritualism, 161, 271, 272, 355, 381; in Georgia, 163; and the Memorial, 355.
- Robinson, Rev. John, 28.
- Roman Catholic Church, 433.
- Romanists, the, 48 et seq.; and Puritans, 26; attitude toward Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy, 27; Lord Baltimore, 48; religious liberty among, 59; proscribed in Maryland, 55; decadence, 53, 105, 339; attitude toward the Church, 110; and Anglo-Catholicism, 329; growth, 339; converts and perverts, 340; on slavery, 360.
- Rutledge, Bishop, 370.
- SACRAMENTS, position of, 144, 341.
- Salem (Mass.), 29, 33; (N.J.), 75.
- Salmon, 328.
- Saltonstall, Gov., 131.
- Schwenkfelders, 151.
- Scott, Thomas, 313, 317.
- Scott, Th. F., 358.
- Seabury, Samuel, 200, 207, 208, 218, 227, 249, 257, 290; elected bishop, 227; career, 227; consecration, 229, 234, 255, 260; Toryism, 262; manner, 289; churchmanship, 319.
- Sect, the Church as a, 342, 343, 353, 355; first American, 160.
- Service, 11, 87, 199, 200; for Fourth of July, 247, 263.
- Sewell, 81.
- "Siebentagen," the, 151.
- Simeon, 313, 314, 321.
- Sisterhoods, 354.
- Skelton, Francis, 29.
- Slaves, first, 21; influence of, 192; question of, 279; division of Churches upon, 360; the Church's attitude toward, 361 et seq.
- Smith, Bishop of South Carolina, 282.
- Smith, Bishop of Kentucky, 307.
- Smith, Capt. John, 9, 16, 20.
- Smith, Dr., 216, 227; reorganizing and naming the Church, 220; elected bishop, 221; character, 253, 258, 311; revising the Prayer-Book, 345.
- Social conditions in America, 198, 199, 311; 1790 to 1812, 277; French influence, 280; modern, 292.
- Society for Propagating the Gospel (S. P. G.), 96, 99, 178, 192; archives of, 104; in South Carolina, 125; in New England, 224.

- South Carolina, see Carolinas.
 State autonomy, 273, 297, 300, 306, 309, 310, 324, 338, 366.
 State, see Church and State.
 State Idea, see Federal Idea.
 Stevens, Bishop, 378.
 St. Philip's, Charleston, 84.
 Stuyvesant, Peter, 62, 70.
 Sunday, observance of, 159.
 Sunday-schools, 294, 320, 351.
 Support of the Church, 21, 57, 121, 201; in Massachusetts, 43; in New York, 67; in South Carolina, 85; in Maryland and Virginia, 92, 107, 117, 121; by S. P. G., 101, 103; in Vermont, 190; lotteries, 201; church property after the Revolution, 219, 221, 287.
 Supremacy, Act of, 8, 26.
 Surplice, 87, 199, 328.
 Swedes, 69, 70; reformed Church, 341, 351.
- TALBOT, JOHN, 101, 103; report from Philadelphia, 102, 177.
 Temperance question, 326.
 Tenison, Bishop of London, 177, 179, 180.
 Tennessee, 301; Church organized, 308; (Memphis), 328.
 Texas, 328, 359; secession, 369.
 Theories, of the Church, Puritans', 27, 31; Churchmen's, 27, 343; Pilgrims', 28; English, 30, 93; two now extant, 173; in New England, 223; of religion, 138, 144, 164, 165, 168.
 Thirty-nine Articles, the, 274, 331.
 Toleration, Act of 1688, 32; Romanist, 50, 51, 52; in Maryland, 58; among the Dutch, 62.
 Tories, 204, 207, 216, 225, 247, 279.
 Tractarians, the, 330; object, 333; results, 334, 338, 340, 341.
 Trinity, the doctrine of, 248, 249.
 Trinity Church, New York, 67, 95.
 "Tunkers," the, 150.
- Tyng, Rev. Dr. S. H., 318.
 Tyng, Rev. Stephen H., Jr., 397.
- UNIFORMITY, Act of, 8, 10; effect of, 11, 12, 26, 32; in Maryland, 106; tendency toward, 271; uncatholic, 348, 352; "catholic," 352; forsaken, 381.
 Unitarianism, 248.
 Unity, striving for, 257; Dr. Parker's scheme, 259; secured (in the Church), 263; with Methodists, 290, 291, 292; Memorial of 1853, 346, 350, 353, 357; the Church's hope, 381.
 Universalism, 317.
 University, of Pennsylvania, 151, 135; of the South, 369.
 Upfold, Bishop, 353.
 Uses, variety of, 11.
- "VENERABLE SOCIETY," 96; see S. P. G.
- Venn, 313.
 Ver Mehr, Dr., 358.
Via Media, 335, 340.
 Virginia, 14; Commissary Blair in, 112; loyalty of, 112; reorganizing the Church, 222; condition in 1800, 287; in 1820, 296; seminary, 321.
- WAINWRIGHT, BISHOP, 338, 350.
 War, the Civil, effects of, 379, 380.
 Warrington, Rev. Thomas, 123.
 Washburn, Dr., 355.
 Washington, George, 120, 203, 287.
 Welsh, the, and Indians, 82; Church colony, 120.
 Wesley, 124, 161, 329; in Georgia, 162; among the Moravians, 152, 164; his conversion, 165; purpose, 168; organization, 169, 171, 291.
 West, the Church in, 322, 357, 358, 381.
 White, Bishop, plan for American Episcopate, 188; confirmation,

- 200, 282; patriot, 207; after the Revolution, 218, 224; career, 237, 290; revising the Prayer-Book, 245; elected bishop, 253; striving for unity, 258; and the English succession, 260, 262; death, 320.
- White, Rev. John, 29.
- Whitefield, George, 124, 168, 329; character, 141.
- Whittaker, Alexander, 19, 113.
- Whittingham, Bishop, 326, 343, 365.
- Wilberforce, Bishop, 362, 363 u.
- William of Orange, 46, 64, 232.
- William and Mary College, 113; value to the Church, 116; after the Revolution, 288.
- Williams, Bishop, 350, 352.
- Williams, Roger, 40, 62.
- Wilmer, Bishop, 371, 375.
- Wilmington (Del.), 69.
- YALE COLLEGE, 127, 134.
- Yeo's report of Maryland, 54.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

0038093715

06698624

